The figures have six arms. The yab embraces the yum with his principal arms, his crossed hands holding a vajra and bell, as we saw with Cakrasamvara. At the same time, the yum embraces the yab with two of her arms, also holding a vajra and bell. In his other right hands the yah holds the wheel and the lotus. In her other right hands, on the opposite side of the figure, the yum holds the same emblems. In their other left hands both yab and yum hold a jewel and a sword.

Those familiar with the five Buddhas of the mandala will recognize their emblems: Vairocana's wheel, Amitabha's lotus, Ratnasambhava's jewel, and Amoghasiddhi's sword (though his emblem is more commonly the double vajra). In the Guhyasamaja system, Aksobhya occupies the centre of the mandala, so the figure's central hands hold his emblem the vajra, and the vajra-bell.

This figure, once one has accustomed oneself to the strangeness of the multiple heads and arms, becomes one of the most beautiful of all Buddhist images. It is a symbol of a psyche, and a universe, in which everything is in perfect harmony. The faces are serene, the sitting posture has a calmer feel than the dancing and trampling of the other yidams we have met. Yab and yum perfectly mirror each another in their hand positions and emblems. They, and all the opposites they represent, are in total accord.

Even the two sides of the figures are in balance. Drawing a vertical line through the centre of the figures would still leave two harmonious sides with all the six emblems. We are in a world where opposites attain a two-in-oneness, and the same cosmic laws can be demonstrated in the macrocosm or microcosm.

The Father and his consort are seated in the middle of a mandala palace surrounded by thirty other deities. Once again we have symbolism of the connectedness of macrocosm and microcosm, for the retinue of the central pair, who themselves hold the emblems of the five Buddhas, includes Vairocana, Ratnasambhava, Amitabha, Amoghasiddhi, and their consorts.

Guhyasamaja is a particularly important yidam for the Gelukpas. Their two main Tantric colleges, the Gyuto and Gyume, which used to be based in Lhasa, both gave great prominence to the practice of his sadhana, and the Guhyasamaja system is used by the Gelukpas as the paradigm for approaching an understanding of other Highest Tantra systems of practice.

Guhyasamaja belongs to the Vajra family of Aksobhya. His practice belongs to the Father Tantra, which concentrates on compassion and skilful means, using complex yogic methods to bring about the development of the illusory body. Father Tantra, as we have seen, is concerned with the transmutation of anger and aggression. The Guhyasamaja Tantra is basically concerned with the realization that the universe is inherently wondrous and valuable. This can only come about when the passions, in particular hatred and aversion, have been transmuted.

Kalacakra

Kalacakra is a yidam who has become quite well known in Tibetan Buddhist circles in the West. This is because a number of lamas have given mass initiations into his practice. The Dalai Lama has given Kalacakra initiations attended by thousands of people in a number of places in Europe and America, as well as in India.[54] In consequence, several books on the Kalacakra system are now available in the West.

This practice of giving mass initiation for a yidam of Highest Tantra is very uncommon, and gives Kalacakra a peculiar significance for the Tantric tradition. In a way, the initiation is regarded as more general, and the commitments one takes are not seen as being as serious as those for other Highest Tantra initiations. The Tibetans consider that, while of course one should make every effort to take the initiation and the commitments seriously, the act of simply attending and participating will be beneficial. The initiation will plant seeds of a positive nature in one's mind which, if tended, can ripen at a later date as catalysts of spiritual progress. These initiations then take on the significance of large festive occasions, auspicious for all those who attend them in good faith.

Kalacakra (Tibetan Du Kyi Khorlo, sometimes abbreviated to Dukhor) means 'wheel of time', and time is one of the central concerns of the Kalacakra system. Especially in the commentaries on this tantra there is a great deal of discussion of time and transcending time - as the experience of Enlightenment transcends time and space. In general, this system of Tantric practice uses a developed view of time to arrive at the Timeless. It is usually classified as a Mother Tantra, and both deity and tantra are highly regarded by all Tibetan schools. It is an exceedingly complex system of thought and practice, which has outer, inner, and secret levels. The outer teachings of Kalacakra are concerned with astronomy, astrology, and mathematics. The inner teachings deal with the body and its energy channels. The secret teachings are the actual instructions for meditating on the Kalacakra mandala.

According to tradition, the Kalacakra Tantra was proclaimed by the Buddha, himself appearing in the form of Kalacakra a year after his Enlightenment.[55] He taught the Tantra at Dhanyakataka in southern India, inside a huge stupa, at the request of King Sucandra. Sucandra was king of Shambhala - a legendary country to the north-east of India. The king returned to Shambhala, built a three-dimensional mandala of Kalacakra, and made Tantric Buddhism based on the Kalacakra system the state religion.

The Kalacakra teachings were propagated in Shambala by a line of kings. The eighth, Manjusrikirti, initiated many people into the Tantra, and also composed a short text - the 'Condensed Kalacakra Tantra' - which is what is now generally known as the Kalacakra Tantra. In consequence he became known as Kulika (one who bears the lineage). According to tradition, the Kalacakra teachings are still being propagated in Shambala by the Kulika kings. An Indian master from Orissa called Cilupa is said to have travelled to Shambala and returned with Kalacakra teachings, which were subsequently passed on to Naropa and then to Atisa. The fact that there is no trace of the Tantra in India before Cilupa has led some scholars to suggest that the Tantra originated somewhere in central Asia.

The Kalacakra teachings came to Tibet with Atisa in 1026. Their introduction into Tibet led to a new system of measuring time in sixty-year periods. Five elements, fire, earth, water, wood, and metal, were added to the twelve-year system by which each year is attributed to one of the signs of the zodiac.

The Kalacakra system was studied by all schools of Tibetan Buddhism. It was propagated by the great Sakyapa lamas Sakya Pandita and Phakpa. Tsongkhapa, the founder of the Geluk order, wrote several short works on it, and his two main disciples both wrote extensive commentaries.

To achieve a clear visualization of the most complex mandala of Kalacakra would be a meditative tour deforce. One would have to become, in meditation, a four-faced male deity with consort, standing on the figures of Kamadeva (the Indian god of love) and Rudra. Two goddesses, the consorts of the subjugated gods, hold on to Kalacakra's heels, their heads bowed.

The yab is blue, and has six shoulders, twelve upper arms, and twenty-four lower arms. The lower arms are arranged in three sets of four on each side, each set of a different colour. The uppermost set on each side is white, the middle red, the lower blue. Each of his arms holds a symbolic implement, such as a sword, a wheel, or an axe. Even his fingers are of different colours.

As Kalacakra one would embrace the consort Visvamata (mother of all). She is yellow in colour, with four faces and eight arms. She holds a curved knife, an iron hook, a damaru, and a rosary in her right hands, and a skull, a noose, a white lotus, and a jewel in her left. One would see oneself standing in the middle of a glorious palace at the centre of a five-levelled mandala-palace, surrounded by a radiating pattern of hundreds of figures.[56]

The yidam and his mandala fuse time and the Timeless, the 'endless round' and absolute Reality, into one non-dual vision in which neither polarity is suppressed. Perhaps one day we shall see Western tantras produced which combine our knowledge of astronomy and other sciences with the profound Enlightened viewpoint of the Buddha. What extraordinary figures, what marvellous mandalas, could such a vision produce!

Dakini visualized in the Chod rite

Six

Dancing in the Sky

In the last two chapters we have met the guru and the yidam, the esoteric versions of the Buddha and Dharma Refuges. Now it is time to meet the dakini, the third esoteric Refuge, the hidden jewel - the hidden ruby, we could say - of the Sangha.

Personally, I think it is impossible to produce an adequate definition of a dakini. To attempt to catch a dakini in the iron trap of mundane logic is a hopeless task. In one Sanskrit dictionary the word dakini is said to refer to a class of flesh-eating demoness. The Tibetan translation, khandroma, means female sky-goer. Sometimes she is referred to as a sky-dancer. The male counterparts, dakas, do exist, but they play a relatively insignificant role in the Tantra, whereas dakinis are central to it.[57]

Rather than define the dakini, let us try to see the situations in which she appears. We have seen that she is the esoteric Sangha Refuge, so we can expect her to be related to the guru in the same way that the Sangha is related to the Buddha. The Sangha is the community of all those who are learning from the Buddha how to follow the path to Enlightenment. The Sangha gathers round the Buddha as often as possible - to learn from him and for the sheer pleasure of being with him. On the esoteric level, then, we should expect to find dakinis clustering around the vajraguru.

This is indeed the case. If you find the vajraguru, the dakinis will not be far away. However, the Tantric guru - the 'thunderbolt guru' who will stop at nothing to show you Reality - is often difficult to find. For example, Naropa spent a very long time searching for Tilopa. When you do find the guru he will often be in a strange or frightening place: on an island in the middle of a poisonous lake like Kukkuripa (one of Marpa's gurus), in the depths of the jungle like Naropa, or most frequently in a cremation ground. It is in places like these that you find the vajraguru, and so it is in these fearsome places that you will meet the dakinis. Padmasambhava, for example, spent many years meditating in cremation grounds (that had names like Piled-Up Corpses, and Sleep in the Mysterious Paths of Beatitude). In each one he feasted and danced with the dakinis, and taught them the Dharma.

So to meet a dakini is not easy. They are not domesticated but wild. To find them you have to leave behind the security of your views and ideas. You have to abandon the tidy civilized world of mundane concepts. You have to walk out into the unknown, the unexplored, the unimaginable.

A Tibetan yogin named Khyungpo Naljor visited India many times, searching for a highly-realized teacher who could show him the way to full Enlightenment. All the teachers he met told him that he should try to meet the yogini Niguma, who had been the disciple and Tantric consort of Naropa. On simply hearing the name of Niguma, Khyungpo Naljor was filled with great happiness, and he set off to find her. He had been told that she had gone beyond any dependence on the physical body, but that she sometimes appeared in a certain cemetery.

When he arrived in the cemetery, the yogin fearlessly sat himself down in the midst of the corpses and the wild animals that dwelt there. As a result, he had a vision of a brown dakini. She was completely naked, except for a few ornaments, all made of human bone. She had a khatvanga and carried a skull cup. She was dancing ecstatically in the sky high above his head. At times she multiplied herself into many wild dancing figures, filling the sky, at others there was just one great figure in the air above him.

Khyungpo Naljor realized he must be in the presence of Niguma, and asked for instruction. But the dakini said that she was an ogress, and when her helpers arrived they would feast on his blood; he had better escape while he still had his skin. Kyungpo Naljor ignored this threat, and continued asking for teaching. Seeing that he could not be scared away, the dakini changed tack. She asked him for a large amount of gold for her teaching. (In Tantra it is usual to give something of value for initiation, to demonstrate one's seriousness, and out of gratitude for the immense spiritual riches to which the empowerment gives access.) Kyungpo Naljor had saved up a great deal of gold with which to seek teachings in India. Very reverently he offered it all to the dakini. Without a moment's hesitation she threw it away into the jungle.

If there had been any doubt in the yogin's mind before, it was wiped away by this evidence of the dakini's complete non-attachment, even to tremendous wealth. He knew that he was dealing with an Enlightened teacher. The dakini then proceeded to give him initiation, much of it in dreams.

In this story we see how the dakini can appear. She irrupts out of another realm. It can happen anywhere, at any time, but she reveals herself most truly when she dances free in the sky of Emptiness. There is nothing fixed about her, though. She is quite capable of shifting shape. She may manifest as a beautiful young maiden or goddess, or as a decrepit old crone. The dakini Vajrayogini appeared to Naropa as a hag with thirty-seven ugly features. (After she had convinced Naropa to seek Tilopa, and then vanished like a rainbow, Naropa sang a song giving thirty-seven similes for the dangerous and unsatisfactory nature of samsara.)

The dakini may appear as voluptuous and alluring, or as threatening. (Niguma first warned Kyungpo Naljor that she was a flesh-eating demoness.) Some dakinis are part animal. They may have the heads of boars, tigers, crows, bears, jackals, or a host of other strange creatures. Their bodies can be any of, or all of, the colours of the rainbow. Most usually, however, the dakini appears as a naked, dishevelled, dancing, witch-like woman. Her element is the sky, and it is there that she dances.

Let us look more closely at one of the most important of all dakinis. This is Vajrayogini (Tibetan Dorje Naljorma), who to Naropa appeared withered and wrinkled (perhaps because he had lost himself in scholarship, so the upsurging forces of inspiration, which dakinis embody, had become dull and neglected.) More commonly, Vajrayogini appears as a sixteen-year-old girl, an age considered by Indians to be the prime of youth. She is a virgin, symbol of her complete innocence in relation to samsara. Her body is a brilliant, fascinating red - the colour of arousal and passion, for Vajrayogini is fiercely in love with the Dharma. She has flowing dishevelled black hair, for she has gone beyond concern for worldly appearances. She dances, abandoning herself to the inspiration of the Dharma.

In her right hand she brandishes a vajra-chopper above her head. This is a brutal implement, used by butchers for cutting and flaying. It has a vajra handle, and its blade is razor-sharp. With her chopper the dakini cuts off all attachment, especially concern for the physical body. For the faint-hearted, the brandished vajra-chopper is a threat of destruction. For the brave it is an invitation to approach and be cut free of all limitations. In her left hand she clasps to her heart the skull cup of Sunyata, filled with the ambrosia of Great Bliss, for it is this mahasukha which the dakini pours out like wine to her devotees.

On her head is a tiara, for she is spiritually rich. However, rather than jewels, it is set with five human skulls. These are reminders of the Wisdoms of the five Buddhas in a form that cannot be ignored.

Around her neck hangs a garland, not of flowers but of human heads, freshly-severed and dripping with blood. There are fifty of them. These correspond to the sixteen vowels and thirty-four consonants of the Sanskrit alphabet, known as ali and kali. As her ornaments they symbolize that the dakini has purified speech on the subtlest level. The circle of heads also suggests the endless round of birth and death. The dakini thrusts herself beyond it, and life and death become her ornaments. Thus she wears armlets, wristlets, and anklets of human bone. In the centre of her chest, secured by strings of bone, is a mirror in which all beings can see the effects of their past actions. These adornments are the dakini equivalents of silks and jewels - symbolizing the six Perfections of the Bodhisattva. While dakinis are beautiful and can appear in wondrous raiment, it is as though they are too close to the realities of existence to cover themselves in pretty, alluring things. They are the Truth, and you can take them or leave them, they are not going to try to entice you. It is as though the Bodhisattvas such as Avalokitesvara and Tara are the Dharma experienced in the warmth of the heart. Dakinis are the Dharma felt in one's guts.

In the crook of her left arm Vajrayogini holds a magic staff, similar to Padmasambhava's. This symbolizes her mystic consort. Though she appears in female form, the dakini is not lacking in masculine qualities. She is the perfect synthesis - feminine and masculine dancing together. The masculine is present, but more hidden and inward.

She dances with her right foot raised, so that her legs form a rough bow and arrow shape. The supporting left leg is the bow, the upraised right the arrow. The bow and arrow are important symbols in Tantra, symbolizing the inseparability of wisdom and method. With her left foot she is trampling on a prostrate human figure - symbol of the craving, hatred, and ignorance that she has subdued, and which she now victoriously stamps into the ground. Yet she is not concerned with what is happening under her feet. Her mastery of samsara is so total that she flattens obstacles effortlessly, like a small boy treading on an ant.

The whole movement of her being is upwards. Her hair stands on end. She leaps as she dances, as though impatient to take off into a higher dimension. In the centre of her forehead is a third eye, for she is able to see a higher truth, a wisdom beyond duality. All around her body, flames leap upwards. These are the fires of her soaring inspiration, her unquenchable energy, her purifying wisdom. They are fires of love burning for all that lives.

Her expression is ecstatic. She is drunk with wisdom, entranced with spiritual power, wild with compassion, insatiable for truth. At the same time her look is dangerous, warning. Like all dakinis, she doesn't fool around.

The more frequently visualized dakinis

The Tantra recognizes three orders of dakini, the lowest of which have not emancipated themselves from samsara and may be either helpful or hostile to human beings. The middle order is associated with twenty-four sacred places to be found in India and Tibet, and can only be perceived by those who are spiritually developed. These twenty-four sites are also related to aspects of the subtle body, and in some forms of advanced Tantric practice dakinis of this order are visualized within one's body. The highest order is known as 'spontaneously Enlightened' and consists of emanations of the dharmakaya. Most of the dakinis we shall look at in this section belong to this highest order, being embodiments of full Enlightenment.

We have already met Vajrayogini in one of her principal manifestations. She can be red or white, though red is more common. As we shall see, though dakinis can be of any colour they are frequently red, as they are associated with passion and intensity in the quest for Enlightenment, and the fiery upsurging forces of spiritual inspiration.

Vajrayogini is visualized in many different forms of Tantric practice. For instance, in a Nyingma sadhana of Guru Yoga one transforms oneself into Vajrayogini. Above one's head is one's own teacher, and above him, one above another in the sky, is the lineage of gurus, going back through time to its Enlightened source. One becomes Vajrayogini in this practice to emphasize receptivity to the gurus of the lineage, and perhaps to attract their blessings magically, by appearing in the most fascinating form possible.

Vajrayogini is also a central figure in the tummo or 'heat yoga', which is the first of the 'six doctrines' of Naropa and Niguma. This advanced practice is capable of increasing bodily warmth, rendering one impervious to cold. Though much is made of this by some Western writers, it is really only a side-effect. The main purpose of the practice is to produce an extraordinary concentration of psychophysical energy. This is done by inducing the subtle energies of the body to become unified by entering the central channel of the subtle energy pathways within the body. Inducing these energies to enter the central channel produces a very strong experience of blissfulness. As we saw in Chapter One, combining this blissful experience with contemplation of Sunyata is an extremely effective way of gaining full realization. Vajrayogini is visualized in the tummo yoga, as she symbolizes particularly the union of Emptiness and Great Bliss. Her red colour also suggests the blazing fire of tummo.

Another appearance of Vajrayogini occurs in the Chod Rite, which we shall examine briefly when we meet Machik Labdron. In general, Vajrayogini appears in many Tantric practices, as well as having a number of sadhanas of Highest Tantra devoted purely to her.

Vajrayogini appears in several forms other than her dancing one. For instance, she can have the same colours, implements, and so on, but be stepping to the left, with her right leg outstretched. In this form, she is also known as Sarvabuddhadakini (dakini of all the Buddhas), for she is that huge wave of passionate commitment to Truth and Freedom which has carried all the Buddhas to Enlightenment. In Tibetan, this form is known as Naro Khacho - the dakini of Naropa. Her practice is one of the thirteen 'golden dharmas' of the Sakya school of Tibetan Buddhism. This time both her feet stamp on samsaric figures. In this position she no longer waves the chopper aloft; it is held loosely by her right side, as though it has done its work. Here she perhaps emphasizes the stage of the path beyond that at which one needs to cut down the promptings of samsara. If you have to cut them down, you are still involved with them, still using energy in fighting them. Beyond this you reach a relaxed state in which the mind can be left alone. Your understanding of Reality is such that thoughts and emotions can be allowed to form themselves and dissolve away, like bubbles on a stream.

If her right hand has relaxed, her left now comes fully into play. The skull cup is no longer held to her heart but aloft, above her head, which is tilted back, as she quaffs a flow of the red light-nectar of Great Bliss, which looks just like blood. Blood is life, and the dakini drinks incessantly, becoming filled with spiritual zest and energy. Her large breasts are thrust forward, symbolizing her capacity to bestow Great Bliss on all beings.

Another almost identical form of this dakini, which is of particular importance for the Kagyu school of Tibetan Buddhism, is Vajravarahi (Tibetan Dorje Phamo). She can only be distinguished from the dancing form of Vajrayogini by one characteristic. In her piled-up hair appears the head of a sow. Vajravarahi means diamond sow. The pig or sow is a Buddhist symbol for ignorance. It appears at the centre of the bhavacakra, or Wheel of Life, in a kind of dance with the snake of hatred and the cock of craving. The three career round in a circle, each one biting the tail of the one in front. The sow in Vajravarahi's hair is like a trophy. She has severed the head of the sow of ignorance with her vajra-chopper, and brought the drunken dance of samsara to an end.

Machik Labdron

Similar again is Kurukulla (Tibetan Rikjema). Another red, dancing figure, she is holding not a vajra-chopper and skull cup but a flowery bow and arrow. These are the weapons of Kamadeva, the Indian god of love - half-brother to Cupid, and just as good a shot. Kurukulla's function is to fascinate people. By a kind of love-magic she leads even enemies of the Dharma to fall at her feet. Sometimes she has four arms, so that as well as the bow and arrow she holds a hook and a noose. Having shot her victims, she pulls them in with the hook and binds them with the noose. Some of her Tantric rituals are not for the squeamish, and perhaps come a little close to black magic.[58]

Perhaps the most extraordinary of all these red dakini forms is one described in the Sadhanamala, and associated with the tradition of Savaripa. Here, she stands in an aggressive stance, holding the vajra-chopper in her right hand and her own head, which she has severed, in her left. She is flanked by the dakinis Vajravairocani and Vajravarnani. Three streams of blood spurt from her headless neck and flow into her own mouth and the mouths of the two other dakinis. The severing of the head symbolizes the cutting off of all ego discrimination.

We have seen that not all dakinis are emanations of Emptiness. There are a number of great female Tantric teachers who achieved the 'status' of dakinis, and are often represented in dancing dakini form. We have already met Niguma, the disciple and Tantric consort of Naropa, who became a great teacher in her own right, and started an important lineage of the 'six doctrines'.

We have also mentioned Machik Labdron. She was a Tibetan who, in her youth, supported herself by reading the Prajhaparamita volumes. Patrons would employ her to read the texts aloud to gain merit, and she excelled at reading. (Not, as we might imagine in the West, because of the clarity and beauty with which she read, but because of her speed!) In reading these scriptures, she herself began to gain insight into the Perfection of Wisdom. Later she met an Indian teacher called Phadampa Sangye who taught her a form of the Chod Rite. Out of her deep understanding, Machik developed a new form of Chod which has since been incorporated into all Tibetan schools.

Simhamukha

The Chod is a dramatized enactment of the principles of the Perfection of Wisdom. It is also a very powerful statement of faith in non-duality, and a test of your 'spiritual nerve'. To do it you go to an isolated, awe-inspiring place, such as a cremation ground. Then, after various preliminaries, you see your consciousness separate from your body and become a dakini. The dakini then chops what is now your corpse to pieces, and offers it, in a transmuted form, to all spiritual beings out of devotion, and to all mundane beings out of compassion. It is a particularly effective way of actualizing the 'spiritual ideas' of impermanence, insubstantiality, and non-duality, and attaining to a state of complete confidence in the Dharma, beyond hope and fear.

Another famous woman siddha is Yeshe Tsogyal, one of the main disciples of Padmasambhava. After his disappearance to the Land of the Raksasas she became an important teacher in her own right. She was also responsible for writing down and concealing many of the termas left by Padmasambhava. These we could call 'Dharma time-capsules' - teachings that have been hidden in out-of-the-way places until they are needed. Padmasambhava is credited with the clairvoyant ability to see into future ages and teach the Dharma in forms suitable for the particular needs of those times. It is those teachings which Yeshe Tsogyal disseminated through Tibet. She is often shown in dakini form, with a skull cup and a vajra-chopper.

The great guru Padmasambhava himself appears as a dakini (which ought to dispel any fixed ideas we have of 'spiritual appearances' corresponding to physical sex). He appears as Simhamukha or Simhavaktra ('lion-faced' or 'lion-headed' one, Tibetan Senge Dongchenma). She is a particularly powerful guardian dakini, invoked in the exorcism of hindering forces. She is dark blue in colour, dancing with vajra-chopper and skull cup. Her head is that of a lion. Dwelling on Simhamukha should give us new insights into the nature of Padmasambhava.

The dakini within

So far I have spoken of dakinis as though they were externally existent beings, to be found in ancient Indian cremation grounds and the wildernesses of Tibet. But where is the real wilderness, the true cremation ground, to be found? Tilopa, in teaching Naropa, repeatedly tells him:

> Look into the mirror of your mind...
> The mysterious home of the Dakini.

To understand how we can meet dakinis within our own mind, we need to look more closely at what the dakinis symbolize. In essence, dakinis are all those experiences, internal and external, that inspire us and spur us on to practise the Dharma. Internally, the dakini is all those outpourings of something higher and more spontaneous within us that make us feel we are on the right track, that we are making progress on the spiritual path. This does not mean that they are simply comforting. Occasionally they may be shattering, like lightning-flashes of insight that turn our view of ourselves and the world completely upside down. °

Whether we find the dakinis' presence enjoyable or terrifying depends upon our degree of openness to them. If we meet them wholeheartedly, they come to us as feelings of inspiration, moods of great happiness and exhilaration, dauntless courage, sudden laughter, or total relaxation, the urge to give of ourselves completely, bursts of energy, poetry, and song. All these experiences on the highest level are gifts of the dakinis. The dakinis, you could say, are the muses of the transcendental.

Like the muses, the dakinis are not controllable. They burst forth from higher levels of the mind (their 'mysterious home'). All we can do is create the right conditions for them to appear. We invite the dakini and await developments. We do this mainly by Going for Refuge, committing ourselves wholeheartedly to the path, and doing our best to carry that commitment through.

However, I ought not to talk too blithely about inviting dakinis. A word of warning: do not invite them unless you mean it. If you prove to be a fraud, or not to have the courage of your convictions - if you ostensibly commit yourself but then avoid the consequences - the dakinis may leave you in disgust. (If we look at our lives we find that inspiration often disappears after we have ducked a challenge.) They may even threaten you - or that is how it may feel. If you are on the run from the Truth, on the run from your own creative energies, you will feel as though they are turning against you. You can end up feeling like a lion-tamer whose courage has left him, watching his lionesses jump off their stools and begin to close in on him....

Dakinis do not stand on ceremony. Nor do they care about convention. They understand that all forms are Emptiness. They are the servants and messengers of the vajraguru. The Tantric guru is a desperado let loose in samsara. He is prepared to do anything, however shocking, to save you from ignorance and suffering. So, as his agents, dakinis are dangerous. Perhaps it would be better not to read about them unless you are prepared to take them seriously, to work at transforming yourself in line with what they ask of you.

Dakinis are the unexpected, the spontaneous. They are the opposite of the safe security of one's ego prison. A dakini may search for years (like Leonore for Florestan in Beethoven's 'Fidelio') seeking an opportunity to rescue you from the dungeon of craving and ignorance. When she suddenly appears in the darkness to cut you free from your shackles, you had better want to go with her.

To follow her is a risk. If you do, you will never be quite the same again. Dakinis are wrathful and passionate. They always spell death for the ego. If you are ready, if you delight in her appearance and rejoice in her unpredictability, then you will find she gives death and birth. In exchange for suffering the blow of her vajra-chopper, you will experience a new and unimaginable freedom. She will then allow you to enter her dance, to dance into the fire, the flames of spiralling inspiration and ecstatic creativity. She will bestow her favours on you: wisdom, great bliss, the experience of non-duality, total liberation.

To start with, however, even though we may be committed and making an effort to practise the Dharma, the dakini is likely to be elusive. For a while she appears in a certain spiritual practice, a certain Dharma teaching, a certain person even, and we feel enriched and inspired. Then she moves, shifts, changes shape. She changes her forms more often than a fashion-conscious woman changes her wardrobe. If you are attached to the forms she takes, the clothes she might wear, you will be left treasuring only a scarf or a shawl as a souvenir. The third of the ten fetters to Enlightenment enumerated by the Buddha was 'attachment to rites and rituals'. This does not mean that ritual has no place in Buddhism; the Buddha just denies that there is any point in going through the motions of any spiritual practice as an end in itself. This attachment to forms for their own sake is a kind of clinging to what the dakini used to wear.

It is easy to become chained to particular aspects of spiritual practice. The wonderful meditation experience you once had can become a trophy, a party piece to trot out to impress your friends. A piece of Buddhist teaching which you have found helpful may become your dogmatic prescription for everyone. The dakini, though, is reborn in every moment. She is in no particular form of practice or teaching. We have to strive to see her as she is in herself- the naked, voluptuous Truth. Once we have met her face to face in that way, she will appear to us in all forms. We shall recognize her unerringly in all aspects of existence, hear her crooning her song of the Dharma everywhere, for she is our own purified consciousness. To elaborate on Tilopa's advice, once the mind is a mirror, cleansed and spotless, then we shall see that it is 'the home of the dakini'.

To arrive at this stage requires a great letting-go. The dakini's halo of flames and total nakedness point to the burning off, the stripping away, of everything inessential. Higher states of consciousness are characterized by their total simplicity. To become one with the dakini we have to follow the counsel of Padmasambhava:

> Let these three expressions: I do not have, I do not understand, I do not know, be repeated over and over again. That is the heart of my advice.

Once this is achieved, you are the dakini, the true free dancer in the limitless sky of Liberation.

The dakini outside

I have said that the dakini represents those inspiring forces which carry you along the path. Through visualizing a dakini in meditation, you call up those energies within yourself. The difference between being in touch with the dakini within and having to rely purely on your everyday energy to follow the path is like the difference between trudging across muddy terrain and hang-gliding above it. Hang-gliding is fast, free, exhilarating, and spiced with a certain risk. Without at least occasional flashes of inspiration, one can tire of the effort involved in painfully picking a path between the potholes. Thankfully, when your inner dakinis refuse to come out to play (for dakinis are playful - if they have gone away perhaps you have been too tense in your approach) there is still the possibility of deriving inspiration from an external dakini.

We have seen that highly realized women can act as dakinis. The tantras make much of finding a woman Tantric practitioner who is a dakini (or, for women, of finding a daka - a suitably qualified male sexual partner). Such women are said to have recognizable physical characteristics. The texts give detailed descriptions. On meeting with such a woman, the texts urge you to perform sexual yoga with her to further your realization. However, all this concerns the highly advanced Tantric practitioner. It has nothing to do with the satisfaction of mundane sexual desire, and for most of us this is so far beyond our present level and capabilities that it does not warrant thinking about. Unfortunately, there will always be people who bring their spiritual progress to a halt by assuming that they are ready for such practices when they are still light-years distant from the necessary degree of attainment. It is very easy to fool oneself that one is engaging in sexual yoga, and that one's partner is a daka or dakini, when really one's feet are still set in the concrete of craving.

Assuming that we are not highly advanced Tantric adepts, and do not have the good karma to meet a highly realized partner, can we find a dakini outside? We have seen that the Tantra, in its pragmatic way, tries to find equivalents to the spiritual in our experience. So the guru becomes the esoteric (or 'directly experienced') Buddha Refuge. The dakini is the esoteric Sangha Refuge - the hidden ruby of the Sangha. The purpose of the sangha is to inspire and encourage us along the path. The visualized dakini, the dakini within, has this function. However, we can also see whether there is some fellow practitioner of the Dharma who inspires us.

We may find the sangha in general inspiring, but for the Tantra this is not enough. The esoteric Refuges are personal. We could even call them the 'intimate' Refuges. They are the aspects of the exoteric Refuges with which we feel a direct link, and to which we have made an individual commitment. Though sangha members may be encouraging and helpful, that does not qualify them to be our dakini Refuge. However, if there is a fellow Dharma practitioner with whom we have direct personal communication, and whose company and example stir up our energy to practise the Dharma, then for us that person acts as a dakini. They may be a man or woman, sixteen years old or eighty, no matter. The criterion is that in their presence we call up more energy for our efforts to follow the path. They wake us up. They get us moving.

If we find such a person, it is no good sitting around hoping they will be our friend. We just have to commit ourselves to being a friend to them. If we are active, giving to them and helping them, then if they have that dakini quality they will respond.

Once again, as with the inner dakini, we had better mean it. Spiritual friendship (Sanskrit kalyana mitrata) is demanding. It is fuelled by authentic communication. It is close; there are strong feelings involved. Nonetheless, there can hardly be anything so deeply satisfying, and so pleasurable, as a spiritual friendship with someone who for us has that dakini quality.

In such a friendship, people work to remove any barriers between them. They let go of thinking of their own needs, of fear of self-revelation and intimacy. They try to let go of everything and give themselves to the Dharma, to a mutual exploration of the Truth. They take delight in that Truth, knowing that they are together in this evanescent form so briefly that their meeting has never been before and never will be again, and that in the moment they are both unknowable. When two separate individuals are united in the Dharma, there we find the play, the true dance, of the dakinis.

The Four Great Kings

Seven

The Dark Armies of the Dharma

Avalokitesvara, the Lord of Compassion, gazes out across the world, his white radiance soothing the sufferings of living beings. With one pair of hands he clasps to his heart the wish-fulfilling gem of his vow to eradicate the world's pain. In his upper left hand he holds the lotus of spiritual receptivity, the desire to leave the mud of samsara and reach up towards the sun of true happiness. Above his head we sense the oceanic love of Amitabha, his spiritual father. In Avalokitesvara's heart the mantra om manipadme hum rotates ceaselessly, pouring its light into the six realms of suffering.

In his upper right hand we see his crystal mala turning. With each bead another being's sufferings are extinguished. We watch the dancing reflections in the crystal beads, follow their steady rhythm as aeons pass.

Still the beads flow through the milk-white fingers. The pace is steady, smooth, ceaseless. And yet... there is still so much agony, pain, and frustration mirrored in those patient eyes. Hearts which hear the call of the mantra and long to respond are chained by dark forces, restrained by fear, bewildered by confusion, so that they do not know whence the sound comes or how to follow it.

The sapphire eyes cloud with a gathering storm of spiritual impatience. They steal a glance at the steady, but too slow, circling of the crystal beads to their right. They look once more, hard, at the plague forces of ignorance, the jailers of hatred, the ransomers of craving who hold so many beings in their clutches.

The crystal beads begin to change shape. They lose their sparkling reflections for a sun-bleached white. They become a death's head garland, a rosary of skulls. The delicate white hand grows darker, its light changing from white to deep blue, like an eclipse of the sun. The powerful hand's first and last fingers stab the air in a menacing gesture. Around it roars a corona of flames.

With a world-shaking cry the figure, now blue-black, starts to its feet. The wish-fulfilling jewel transforms into a vajra-chopper and a skull cup dripping with red nectar. The soft lotus transforms into a trident with a death's head. From the huge, overpowering blue-black body another arm thrusts out, rattling a skull drum. To the left a further fist uncoils a noose.

The giant figure pounds forward, wild hair streaming upward, tied round with snakes. The massive body, nearly naked, girt only with a tiger-skin, wears skulls - pretty, staring skulls - as jewels. Snake - enwreathed, fang-mouthed, three eyes glaring bloodshot from an awesome face, he marches onward bellowing challenge.

Answering his call, legions of similar figures pour from the empty sky, forming fiery ranks behind him. Thigh-bone bugles summon ever more misshapen Dharma champions out of the ten directions. To the left of the leader, a devil's cavalry of furies appear. Female figures, unkempt and dangerous, riding on horses, riding on goats. Their leader sits side-saddle on a mule, brandishing weapons, wreathed in fire, her fanged face contorted in fury. As she rides, her feet drum on the flayed human corpse that hangs from her saddle.

The dark army hurtles forward and enters the kingdom of Mara, the custodian of samsara. Mara's sentinels see them coming, their warning cries freezing with horror in their throats. No alarm is needed though, for the clashing of the weapons, the pounding of the hooves of that terrible horde, and the battle-cry of their leader causes earthquakes in all six realms, and shakes the foundations of Mara's palace.

Mara's imperial guard, sent out to do or die, hesitates in its first charge, flinging down weapons that would only serve to slow its headlong retreat. Mara's daughters, sent to parley, are dumped unceremoniously over the backs of the advancing cavalry, their alluring dresses dragging in the mud.

Regiments of hatred are routed. The artillery of fear is overrun. Poison clouds of envy and doubt just cause the attackers to grow larger and stronger. In his last stronghold, Mara holds all sentient beings hostage, threatening to take everything down with him. It does him no good. The deepest dungeons of the hells, their walls thick as ignorance, are taken by storm.

The bone mala in the huge right fist whirls so fast now that no skulls can be seen. It is just a perfect circle of white light. As the hostages are led out, free at last, the eyes of the giant black general look down at them with fathomless compassion.

Mahakala ('great black one', Tibetan Gonpo Nakpo Chenpo) is the wrathful manifestation of Avalokitesvara. He is a dharmapala (Tibetan Chokyong) - a 'protector of the Dharma'. We have already met Yamantaka, the wrathful manifestation of Manjusri, as well as the wrathful form of the serene young Bodhisattva Vajrapani. In Tantra, the most benign and peaceful figures can also assume the most horrifying and powerful forms. The greater your love for sentient beings, the more total will be your movement against whatever harms or threatens them. With total selflessness you have an unhesitating, fearless response to their needs.

Dharmapalas are often visualized along with the three esoteric Refuges. They do not form a fourth Refuge, rather they are the vajra-wall of protection that guards the three Refuges, both exoteric and esoteric. They are the bodyguards of the Tantra. They defend its teachings and its practitioners from inner or outer enemies. As is typical of Tantra, their protective power is understood and used on many different levels.

Dharmapalas are invoked for magical protection from external harm by some Tantric practitioners. Namkhai Norbu Rimpoche tells how he used a sadhana of the dharmapalas to give warning of attacks by bandits when making a dangerous journey across Tibet.[62] Tibetan monasteries had a special shrine-room for the performance of dharmapala rituals. The monks assigned to the practice sat in the darkened room, their texts illumined only by the butter lamps on the shrine. In the gloom they could discern the images of the Protectors. The room would be strewn with old weapons donated to the monastery. Carcasses of wild beasts adorned the ceiling. In this awe-inspiring and forbidding place the monks would chant the rituals that protected the area from misfortune, from sickness, and from storm. Their rites, it was believed, cast a circle of protection over the region.

On a deeper level, dharmapalas throw back into the shadows the forces of nightmare and madness which always threaten to tear loose and subjugate the human psyche. On the group level, these forces unleash hatred, war, holocaust, and the destruction of art, culture, and religion. Breaking free in the individual they are psychosis and megalomania. They are the forces of rape and pillage, slaughter and sadism, chaos and dissolution. Finally, they are the forces through which men and women destroy themselves, by which humanity breaks its toys and plunges itself into darkness or oblivion.

These dark and unregenerate forces, the shadow beasts of the psyche, are firmly debarred from entering the mandala, so the dharmapalas also appear as gatekeepers in mandala rituals. On the principle of 'set a thief to catch a thief they appear in menacing forms, more terrifying than the dark horrors they guard against. They stand four-square in the jewelled gateways of the mandala, preventing any negative emotion from disturbing its harmony.

Dharmapalas guard the secrets of the Tantra from idle disclosure to the uninitiated. They protect Tantric practitioners from breaking their vows and pledges. They can be summoned up by the yogin or yogini when intractable forces in their personality threaten to pull them off the path. They also warn against the ugly states into which advanced practitioners who leave the path can fall. Not for nothing are Tantric practitioners sometimes cautioned that with initiation they are bound either for Enlightenment or the worst hell.

The dharmapalas do not simply stand sentry. They move outwards, extending the boundaries of the mandala. They go on the offensive, subduing and transforming the foes of the Dharma. Their weapons and emblems are taken from the dark hordes they have pacified and disarmed. In particular, they have defeated the Maras and Rudra. For Buddhism, Rudra is the personification of the furthest excesses of selfishness. He is the ego gone supernova, ignorance run rampant. (Chogyam Trungpa called him the ultimate spiritual ape.) He is represented as a vast, grotesque figure, brandishing weapons. Pig-ignorant, plug-ugly, he uses the sheer force of his greed and self-centredness to bludgeon his way to power. He is a child's tantrum universalized. In the Life and Liberation of Padmasambhava he is humbled and subdued by the wrathful Vajrapani and the dharmapala Hayagriva.

This symbolism is interesting. The ego, in its attempts to make the world secure for itself, finally bumps into Reality. For the ego, Reality is a threat against which it constantly tries to erect defences, only to have them flattened, sooner or later, like card houses. As a rigid defensive structure, the ego can only see Reality in its own terms, as a more powerful force, a demon that will destroy it. If you 'go with' the Dharma, allow the gentle influence of the Bodhisattvas to soften you, then your open heart experiences the Three Jewels as beautiful and peaceful. If you struggle and resist, then they are dangerous. This is why, in the Tibetan Book of the Dead, after the dead person fails to recognize the peaceful deities and escapes from them, wrathful deities appear. It is as though the bardo-being is all the time experiencing the Clear Light of his own consciousness, but in an increasingly alienated way. First there is the Clear Light itself. From a slight distance of separation, the beginnings of the fall back into duality, the Clear Light of Reality is perceived as the peaceful forms of the Buddhas and their retinues. At a greater distance Reality seems to take on menacing, terrifying forms. It is as though, having tried gently to coax you to it and failed, your Buddha-nature communicates a warning. It tries to head you off from more suffering. If you recognize the true nature of the wrathful deities, you are instantly Enlightened. If you keep on running, you find yourself back on the treadmill of the six realms.

In Tantra, the dharmapalas embody a still further set of meanings. We have seen that Tantra sees the world and its inhabitants in terms of energy. Because of this vision, it finds nothing to reject. Nothing is too horrible, too evil. Every emotion, even the most negative, represents a unit of energy to be harnessed for Dharma practice. It is just a question of finding the appropriate skilful means to turn poison into wisdom. The dharmapalas represent the energies of anger, even hatred and violence, put at the service of the Dharma. Tantra turns anger into vajra-anger. Now powered not by egotism but by inner compassion and serenity, the aggressive impulses of the psyche are channelled into destroying ignorance and suffering.

Tantra is Buddhism in the Underworld. It teaches the Dharma to our shadow sides, to the gnomes and hobgoblins of our unconscious, adopting forms and apparel familiar to the denizens of those inner territories. Just as we saw that, with mudra, Tantra takes Buddhism to our fingertips, through the dharmapalas it takes the golden message of the Enlightened Ones into the darkest underground troll-chambers of the mind.

The dharmapalas are a source of courage for Tantric practitioners, standing by them in their spiritual struggles and sounding warning notes if they stray from the path. More than that, by visualizing dharmapalas in meditation, Tantric practitioners can connect with the fearlessness of the Enlightened Mind and rally the energy required to break through to new levels of awareness.

However, when meditating on these wrathful guardians, Tantric practitioners must beware of falling into mere mundane anger. They have always to bear in mind that, though of outwardly terrifying aspect, the dharmapalas are inwardly serene and gentle. They are manifestations of the most beneficent forces imaginable. Their fierce power is subordinate to the great love and compassion of the Bodhisattva.

Within the spiritual community, with their vajra brothers and sisters, Tantric practitioners can manifest as dakinis, totally open and loving, joining in the dance within the mandala. Venturing out into the dark alleys of unbelief, striding the corridors of power, they don the spiritual armour of awareness, patience, and energy. Then the dakini may transform into a dharmapala.

Spiritually-minded people are sometimes expected to be meek and mild-mannered. Buddhism values true gentleness, but it also thinks highly of heroism and clear thinking. You may approach a Buddhist teacher with some clever intellectual question only to have your words crumpled up and thrown back at you. You may find your vague generalizations and woolly rationalizations hacked to pieces before your eyes. To the ego, the teacher may appear at times like a larger ego, shooting you down in flames, so completely self-assured that you may feel he or she is not open to your viewpoint. However, the teacher may just be defending the Truth, quite selflessly, from your attempts to sabotage it.

The certainty of a true spiritual teacher comes not from fixed views but from their own insight into Reality. They are unshakeable. They may even get angry, which can be terrifying. They can mobilize more aggressive energy than ordinary people because they are much more concentrated. At times you may feel seared by the burst of fire directed at you. You may realize only later that the vajra hurled in your direction left you unscathed. It simply shattered some of the chains which bound you, leaving you freer than before.

The dharmapalas are also a reminder to the practitioner that the dark side of life is an expression of Reality, just as much as the light and beautiful. Recognizing the wrathful forms as aspects of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas makes it easier to see difficult or frightening situations as expressions of Sunyata. The dharmapalas represent the way the Tantric practitioner accepts the challenge of painful life events, and by becoming one with them transforms their nature. We have come across the suggestion that work is a Tantric guru. For the alert disciple, all situations, whether seemingly good or bad, can be their guru. They can all be used as opportunities to deepen insight and strengthen compassion.

Dharmapalas are of two kinds. First, there are emanations of the dharmakaya, such as Mahakala, whom we saw hurtle into action at the beginning of this chapter. Then there are mundane entities, known as lords of the soil, who have been converted to the Dharma. The combined total of these two classes of dharmapalas within the Tibetan tradition is several hundred, if not more. The Dalai Lama has discouraged Westerners from involving themselves with meditations on mundane protectors. He feels they are inappropriate to the Western situation.[63] Most of us are still at the stage of learning to relate to the most central figures of Buddhism: the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas, gurus and yidams.

Mahakala

It would not be helpful to become caught up with sadhanas of figures which, while they can exercise a fascination for some people, are of comparatively minor importance for spiritual development. In the rest of this chapter we shall look at a few of the most important Tantric protectors individually.

Mahakala

Mahakala is the most commonly invoked of all Dharma protectors, and is important to all schools of Tibetan Buddhism. In Tibetan he is often known simply as 'the Lord'.

He has over seventy different forms, and each particular school has those it particularly favours. For the Nyingmapas it is the Four-Faced Lord; for the Karma Kagyu the squat, misshapen Black-Cloaked Lord. For the Sakyapas it is the Lord of the Tent, whose special emblem is a magic staff resting across his outstretched arms. For the Gelukpas the most important form is the six-armed, whom we have already seen in action, holding the skull rosary in his upper right hand. He is also invoked in major gatherings of the Geluk monastic assemblies in a four-armed form.

This 'hastening six-armed' form is usually shown trampling on the prostrate form of Ganesha, the elephant-headed Hindu god. Chogyam Trungpa suggests that Ganesha symbolizes subconscious thoughts. When we lapse into distraction and mental chatter, Mahakala stamps out our subvocal gossip, and calls us back to attentiveness. Though there are Mahakalas of different colours, they are typically huge, blue-black, and tremendously wrathful. They are often surrounded by a retinue of similar figures, or by other demons and demonesses. A good example of such a visualization is given in a sadhana of the Four-Faced Lord.

This form of Mahakala is blue-black, with faces to the right and left of the central one, and one above. The front one is black, and munches a corpse. The others are each of a different colour and expression: wrathfully smiling, roaring with laughter, and frowning. All have three glowering eyes, which see into the past, present, and future.

He has four arms. Each performs one of the four karmas, or actions, which is the main task of this Mahakala. These are (1) to subdue sickness, hindrances, and troubles; (2) to increase life, good qualities, and wisdom; (3) to attract whatever Dharma practitioners need and bring people to the Dharma; and (4) to destroy confusion, doubt, and ignorance.

His inner left hand, close to his body, holds the skull cup of nectar. Here, this represents Emptiness and pacification. In his inner right hand he carries a hooked knife, representing skilful means and the power of increasing. His upper right hand wields a sword, which performs the function of attracting. His upper left hand waves a trident spear, for destroying craving, hatred, and ignorance at one thrust.

Wreathed in crackling flames, his body encircled with writhing snakes, and skull-crowned, his right foot stamps down hard on a prostrate figure, representing egotism. From his inner left forearm dangles a mala of skulls, and in the crook of that arm is a pot of wine. His fanged faces glare out, their beards and eyebrows blazing like the fire which will consume the universe at the end of the aeon.

Around him is his retinue. First come the four Mothers: black Dombini, green Candall, red Raksasi, and yellow Simhali, on his four sides. All are naked, with vajra-choppers and skulls of blood. Their bodies emit fire, and they visit plagues on enemies of the Dharma and those who break their Tantric vows. Beyond them march measureless hosts of protectors and the eight classes of demons, as well as twenty-one knife-wielding butchers, each with a retinue of a hundred thousand similar figures. The Dharma army fills the earth and sky.

O Mahakala and the seventy lords in your retinue,
Yours is the power to overcome all Maras
And to carry on high the victory banner of Dharma.
Yours is the power to bring joy to the world.

Sridevi

The female companion of Mahakala, whom we saw riding into battle alongside him and who equals him in power, is Sridevi ('glorious goddess', Tibetan Paldan Lhamo). Just as Mahakala is the 'dangerous' form of the benign Avalokitesvara, so Sridevi has both peaceful and wrathful forms. Her peaceful manifestation is known as Ekamatri Sridevi

In her wrathful guise she is somewhat different. She is dark blue, ferocious, with three bloodshot eyes. Her flaming red hair stands on end, and above her head is a fan of peacock feathers. She has sharp fangs, and laughs with a sound like thunder. She rides on a mule, which is galloping furiously over a sea of blood. It is said that she is riding towards Siberia, after an unsuccessful attempt to convert the king of (Sri) Lanka to the Dharma. Her mule has been hit by the vengeful king's arrow. The wound in its flank has been transformed into a wisdom eye.

She is largely naked, her body wreathed with snakes and adorned with bone ornaments and a necklace of skulls. In her left hand she bears a brimming skull cup. In her right she holds aloft a black skull-topped command staff. Flames roar and black storm-clouds swirl around her as she gallops along. From her saddle hangs a pouch with dice. (Her initiation is held to be a gateway to divinatory powers, and she can be invoked by practitioners of mo, the Tibetan system of divination, which involves the use of dice. There is also a lake called Lhamo Latso, to the south-east of Lhasa, whose reflections are said to reveal the future.) She sits side-saddle on the flayed skin of her own son.[65]

According to a tradition quoted by Alice Getty, Sridevi was given various gifts by other deities. She received the dice from Hevajra in order to determine the life of men. She received the fan of peacock feathers from Brahma (one of the most important Hindu gods, who was incorporated into Tantric Buddhism as a minor protector). Vajrapani gave her a hammer, and various other deities gave her a lion and a serpent, which she wears as earrings, and her mule, which has deadly snakes for reins.

Sridevi brandishes her staff to threaten all obstacles to the success of the Dharma. Her terrible form serves as a warning of the fearsome states into which Tantric practitioners may fall if they fail to keep the pledges taken at the time of initiation. Tantric practitioners also acknowledge that the meditations they practise enable them to accumulate a great deal of psychic power. A person who engages in advanced Tantric practice but no longer feels bound to use the power he or she has gained for ethical purposes is thus a great danger both to themselves and to others. Someone who uses the power derived from a Tantric sadhana to gratify their own ego rather than laying it at the service of all sentient beings is basically engaging in black magic. Figures like Sridevi have the power to subdue those who abuse their power and render them harmless.

Not only can she control dark external forces; Sridevi is capable of pacifying all those hindering inner forces that bind us to the 'wheel of fire' of mundane existence. Hence she is also known in Tibetan as Paldan Makzor Gyalmo ('one who overpowers and crushes the hosts of the passions'). The tradition that she is seated on the skin of her own son suggests perhaps her complete overcoming of all attachment, for of all emotional connections that between mother and child is probably the strongest.

There are many forms of Sridevi, and different schools of Tibetan Buddhism may regard one or another of them as their special protector. Her meditation was introduced into Tibet by Sangwa Sherap, and to begin with she played an important part in the practice of the Sakya school. In the fifteenth century she was 'appointed' Dharma protectress of Ganden, one of the great Geluk monasteries, by the first Dalai Lama. Ever since then she has been a special protectress of the Dalai Lamas. The fifth Dalai Lama wrote instructions for meditating upon her, and a thangka of Sridevi travels with the Dalai Lamas wherever they go. For centuries this thangka was kept unseen in its red case, but in 1940 the present Dalai Lama, then aged about seven and on his way to be enthroned, was met close to Lhasa by a great crowd of officials and notables, including his three main servants, one of whom had brought the thangka, hidden as usual in its case. On seeing it near the entrance to his tent, he promptly grabbed it, took it inside, and opened it. The thangka which had not been unveiled for so long was revealed. The Dalai Lama surveyed it and then replaced it in its case. Everyone present was amazed by what he had done.

Like Mahakala, Sridevi has a retinue, one so large that Blanche Christine Olschak says that a description of this alone would fill a whole iconographic book. It includes the four Queens of the Seasons, the five Goddesses of Long Life, and twelve goddesses known as tanrungmas. These are indigenous Tibetan deities who have been converted to the Dharma, and now guard and protect the practitioners of various meditation lineages.

Sridevi also has in her retinue a type of female protectress known as mahakatt. They are generally mounted on horses or mules, with goatskin bags of poison hanging from their saddles. They have bows and arrows, and lassoes made of snakes. They each wear a mirror, in which all one's karma is reflected. They are swift-acting and ferocious against enemies of the Dharma.

The Nyingma protectors

The Nyingma school is the oldest form of Buddhism in Tibet and calls on many protectors rarely or never invoked by other schools (though the Drukpa Kagyu also invoke the Nyingma protectors). Many are believed to have been converted to the Dharma by Padmasambhava, who in his travels subdued the demons and spirits he encountered in the mountains and other wild places. He subjugated entities hostile to the Dharma by the power he had gained through Tantric practice, forcing them to tell him their seed syllable, their true name, and then binding them by oath to be servants and warriors of the Dharma. In this way, many of the indigenous gods and demons, the Pans and Draculas of Tibet, were converted to the Dharma.

Because they are native to Tibet, these figures can take on very different shapes to that of the Mahakala type of figure. Padmasambhava must have been totally fearless, for these Nyingma protectors appear in some of the most horrific forms imaginable. They are such stuff as nightmares and psychotic hallucinations are made on. They are your worst fears, the creatures you knew were lurking in the darkness when as a child you hid under the bedclothes but could not sleep. They make the rats in Orwell's Room 101 seem like angels. Nonetheless, while commanding a healthy respect from their devotees, these strange figures call forth reverence and devotion in the Tantric practitioner, in the same way as do the benignly-smiling Buddhas. They take many forms, too many to list, and too much to encounter. It will be enough to meet just three of them, who form a group known in Tibetan as ma za dam sum.

First comes Rahula, known to Tibetans simply as Za. He is half serpent, half what we shall have to call humanoid (though any woman giving birth to such a horror would not survive the experience sane). He coils his lower body over the corpse of ego. His upper body is huge, black, and covered with a thousand eyes, all of which glare balefully. In the pit of his stomach is a cavernous mouth which, with the eyes on his upper body, give the feeling that his whole torso is a massive glaring face. He has nine heads, arranged in three tiers of three, each with three bulging eyes. A great breath of sickness issues from their fanged mouths. From the crown of the topmost head sprouts the black, cawing head of a raven.

A human skin is draped over his back. He is wreathed in snakes and adorned with scorpions. In his right hand writhes a sea-serpent, in his left is a bow and arrows, which he fires unerringly at those who break their religious vows. There is no concealment from him as his thousand eyes see your every thought.

In ancient Indian legend, Rahu was a titan who disguised himself and tried to steal nectar from the gods. He was exposed by the sun and moon, and Vishnu cut off his head. However, he lived on in the sky, where he became the dragon's head.[50] Rahu avenged himself on his betrayers by periodically swallowing them - he is the lord of the eclipse. Consequently he is sometimes depicted as a reddish-blue deity holding the sun and moon in his hands.

Rahula is the destroyer of Rahu. Just as Yamantaka took over the attributes of Yama, Lord of Death, so Rahula assumes those of Rahu to protect the Dharma by threatening its enemies with eclipse. His dark body with its myriad eyes is reminiscent of the starry night sky. The gaping mouth in his belly represents the swallowing of sun and moon.

For Tantric yogins, the eclipse of sun and moon can have an esoteric significance. One of the principal aims of Tantric yoga is to eclipse all craving and hatred by bringing the energies which usually flow in two psychic channels (associated with the sun and moon) into the central psychic channel (Sanskrit avadhuti).

In the lives of the eighty-four great mahasiddhas, we find the story of an old man called Rahula, who complains that the full moon of his youth has been swallowed by the Rahu of old age. He gains advanced Tantric realizations following the instructions of a yogin, who sings to him:

When the dragon of non-dual realization
Eclipses the subject/object circle of constructs,
... then the qualities of the Buddhas arise.
Ehma! Immortality is so wonderful!

Za is also known as the lord of lightning. As a Dharma protector, he strikes the enemies of the teaching with epileptic fits and madness. (Popular Tibetan tradition holds that the shadow of Rahula's raven's head falling upon you causes apoplexy.) Then he devours them, cramming their carcasses into the gaping maw in his belly. This is just one of his forms....

If Za was rather overpowering, and you thought a female guardian might be less formidable, I am afraid you are going to be disappointed. The next of the group of three is Ekajata (or Ekajati) (goddess with 'a single plait of hair', Tibetan Tsechikma or Ralchikma). In fact, singularity, or the uncompromising vision of things from the highest viewpoint, seems to be the message of this figure. She too is dark and menacing, flame-enhaloed, nearly naked. Her skull-crowned hair writhes upwards. Her face contorts with fury. Her brows are knitted and she has but one eye, in the middle of her forehead. From her ugly mouth protrudes a single fang. She is often depicted with only one breast. She is wreathed in severed heads. With her right hand she waves a stake on which is impaled a live human figure. In her left hand she displays the heart of a foe of the Dharma, which she has ripped out. She is the supreme protectress of the Dzogchen teachings, the highest and most precious of all Nyingma practices. She also functions as a guardian of mantras - preventing them being disclosed to those unworthy to use them, and ensuring that those who have been empowered to use them do so for appropriate purposes.

She may perhaps guard them in a more general sense as well, preventing them losing their power and efficacy, or from being lost altogether.

As with all the dharmapalas we have met, Ekajata can assume a number of forms and colours. Characteristically she is dark brown, though she can also be red or blue. Her different forms hold various implements or weapons. One scholar describes forms holding a trident, a heart, and a snare; a trident and skull cup; or the heart of an enemy and a 'clever falcon'. She can also, on occasion, dispatch numerous female wolves as messengers.[68]

Ekajata also appears, in a slightly less terrifying form, as an attendant on Green Tara, along with red Marici, the goddess of the dawn. In this context she has two eyes and so forth, and holds a vajra-chopper and a skull cup, and is described as 'sky-blue, wrathful but loving and bright'.[69] By an extension of this role, she came to be seen as a kind of blue form of Tara, known as Ugra Tara, or Tara the Ferocious.

The third member of this fearsome triad is Vajrasadhu ('oath-bound diamond', Tibetan Dorje Lekpa, sometimes shortened to Dorlek). He is considered by those brave souls who have encountered all three of these protectors to be the most approachable. His aid is sometimes enlisted in relatively mundane matters, whereas Rahula and Ekajata are uncompromisingly concerned with threats to the Dharma on the highest level.

Vajrasadhu is a pre-Buddhist Tibetan deity, defeated by Padmasambhava, who bound him and his 360 companions by oath to protect the Dharma. He is most easily recognized by his round, wide-brimmed helmet. He is usually depicted riding on an animal. One common form is red, mounted on a lion, fully clothed, with a skull cup in his left hand. In his right hand he holds aloft a vajra, which he wields with a penetrating gesture.

The environment in which Vajrasadhu is represented as appearing is in keeping with his appearance. In one text it is described as follows:

> Surrounded by the wild sea of blood lies a castle built of bat-bone, from which a five-coloured rainbow emanates. Up in the sky, poisonous clouds gather and a terrific storm, accompanied by fiercely rolling thunder and by the flashing of meteors and lightning, rages there.

Vajrasadhu has a rather sinister emanation known in Tibetan as Garpa Nakpo. This figure is blue-black, seated astride a 'snarling goat'. In his right hand he brandishes a flaming bronze hammer, in his left he holds a blacksmith's bellows. The horns of the goat twist around each another, suggesting the way in which the dualities of relative truth are transcended when one sees things from the viewpoint of absolute truth.

The four gatekeepers and the four Great Kings

One of the major functions of dharmapalas is to act as guardians of the mandala. Generally the mandala palace has four doorways, and in many mandalas these are guarded by four gatekeepers (Sanskrit dvarapala). They stand in the entrances to the mandala, preventing any hindering force from entering. They also have the effect of blocking your retreat if you should lose heart once you have entered the mandala. We shall take as an example the mandala of the five Buddhas as described in A Guide to the Buddhas, the first book in this series. In the Tibetan Book of the Dead, along with other peaceful deities who form the Buddhas' retinue, four wrathful deities appear as guardians of the gates. They are the white Vijaya ('victorious'), the yellow Yamantaka ('slayer of death'), the red Hayagriva ('horse-necked one'), and the green Amrtakundalin ('swirling nectar').

Of these, Yamantaka and Hayagriva are important both as dharmapalas and as personal deities (yidams). We have already met Yamantaka in Chapter Five, so we shall concentrate here on Hayagriva. As the guardian of the western gate, Hayagriva (Tibetan Tamdin) is the particular protector of the Lotus family of Amitabha. Hayagriva is an Indian deity whose Tantric practice was brought to Tibet by Padmasambhava. His recognition symbol is a green horse's head (occasionally there are three of them) protruding from his flaming yellow hair. The horse is neighing wildly in a voice that shakes the three worlds. The horse's head commemorates Hayagriva's part in the subjugation of Rudra, ego run rampant, which is described in the life-story of Padmasambhava. Hayagriva transformed himself into a horse, and entering the vast body of Rudra by the anus forced him to surrender. This incident demonstrates the extremely humiliating and deflating shock that awaits the overblown ego when it encounters Reality. It is not eternal; it cannot control the world. It has to learn humility and a sense of perspective.

The deities we have looked at so far are all of the transcendental order, symbolized by their standing on lotuses. There are other forms of protector, known as lokapalas, who are not expressions of Enlightened consciousness but are invoked as powerful mundane forces, sympathetic to the Dharma and caring for its practitioners. Perhaps the most important of these are the Four Great Kings.

In art, these kings are commonly shown in full armour. They are sometimes standing, sometimes seated in 'royal ease'. Their leader, the King of the North, is Vaisravana (Tibetan Namthore), yellow in colour, holding a cylindrical banner in his right hand, and a jewel-spitting mongoose in his left. In the east, the white Dhrtarastra (Tibetan Yulkhorsung) plays a lute. To the south the green Virudhaka (Tibetan Phak Kye po) holds a sword. In the west, the red Virupaksa (Tibetan Mikmizang) holds a stupa, or reliquary, in his right hand, and a snake, or naga, in his left. They each head a great retinue of living beings, such as gandharvas (celestial musicians) or yaksas (powerful mountain spirits).

The energy of these lokapalas is less overpowering than that of the dharmapalas. They are the beneficent forces at the summit of the mundane who, while not themselves Enlightened, are receptive to the influence of the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. They encourage the good in the world, helping to perpetuate the Dharma, and encouraging its influence to spread. For instance, in chapter 6 of the Sutra of Golden Light they come forward and promise to protect those who propagate the sutra, and in chapter 14 of the Vimalakirti Nirdesa they undertake to protect whoever reads, recites, and explains it.

The order of reality of the dharmapalas

In this chapter we have encountered a class of figures who can be quite overpowering in their ferocity, and terrifying because of the atmosphere of nightmare darkness that surrounds them. Nonetheless, they are all protectors of the Dharma, and are emanations of Emptiness in the same way as the peaceful forms of Buddhas. Because they are apparently so threatening, it can be tempting to explain them away as merely symbolic. Before doing so, we might pause to consider the testimony of Namkhai Norbu Rimpoche concerning depictions of dharmapalas:

> Though the iconographic forms have been shaped by the perceptions and culture of those who saw the original manifestation and by the development of tradition, actual beings are represented.

A Sakyamuni Refuge Tree (from a sadhana written by Sangharakshita)

The Refuge Tree and its Future Growth

In the course of this series of books we have opened the treasury of the Buddhist tradition and encountered the immense riches of its symbolism. It is now time to bring together all the figures we have encountered into one unifying symbol, and to contemplate the totality of the facets of the jewel of Enlightenment.

Tibetan Buddhism has such a unifying symbol, known variously as a Refuge assembly, Field of Merit, or Refuge Tree. It is known as a Refuge assembly because it is a visualized gathering of figures representing the three Refuges. It is known as a Field of Merit because by visualizing a great array of Enlightened figures and then making offerings to them, and by performing other skilful actions, such as committing oneself to the Bodhisattva path in their presence, one gains for oneself a great deal of positive benefit. For Buddhism, thought and imagination are forms of action, and will have positive or negative consequences depending on their motivation. The Tantra takes this to its logical conclusion. When performed with faith and devotion, it sees no inherent difference between making offerings to a hundred Buddhas visualized in meditation and doing so in the outer world. It is known as a Refuge Tree because the assembly is often visualized seated upon a vast lotus flower, with many branches at different levels.

It is possible to visualize a Refuge Tree with any yidam at its centre. Whichever yidam you are concentrating on, you can build up a visualization of all the Refuges with that figure as the central focus. It is even possible to perform a condensed version of the meditation by visualizing just the central figure while maintaining the firm conviction that it is the embodiment of all the Refuges. This figure is sometimes called the samgrahakaya or 'comprehensive body', as it is the synthesis of all objects of Refuge.

The general appearance of the Refuge Tree is similar for all schools of Tibetan Buddhism - all the Refuges, exoteric and esoteric, are ranged in the sky around a central figure who is understood to embody them all. However, each school has one or more forms of Refuge Tree, each of which synthesizes all their main teachers and lineages of meditation practice. It is as though each school had gone to its treasury of spiritual practice and laid out its finest jewels on display in the sky: as well as embodiments of the exoteric Refuges, there are its greatest scholars and yogins, the yidams whose meditations are most central to it, and the dakinis and dharmapalas with whom it has a special connection.

To visualize such an assembly, perhaps including hundreds of figures (if one has the skill to produce such a masterpiece in one's mind's eye), or even to see a well-executed thangka of it, can be quite breathtaking. The sheer number of figures, their richness and variety, and the feeling of the different aspects of the Dharma they embody and express, can have a profound effect on the mind.

Each Refuge assembly is both individual and universal. It is a vehicle through which a Tibetan Buddhist can develop faith and appreciation for the particular school of practice that he or she has joined, and its distinctive traditions of spiritual practice. At the same time, each assembly includes figures representing all the Refuges, both exoteric and esoteric. Thus, although they may depict different figures, each Refuge Tree is a complete symbol of all the aspects of the human psyche raised to the highest pitch of perfection. Within each assembly all our energies are illuminated by the golden rays of Enlightenment, and find themselves included in one great harmony.

As a paradigm for the Refuge Tree we shall look at the Nyingma version, and then go on to consider the differences in emphasis in some of the other schools. We shall also consider the meditational contexts in which these vast assemblies are visualized and, finally, reflect on how they may develop further in the West.

The Nyingma Refuge Tree

For the last time, we shall enter the vast blue sky of sunyata, allowing ourselves to let go of worries and concerns, to drop all limiting concepts, and to expand into the freedom of the unchained mind.

In the midst of that vast blueness appears a cloud made of rainbow light, pouring its rays into the surrounding sky. Out of this multicoloured cloud grows the stem of a great white lotus flower. Seated on the lotus, his body blazing with light, is Guru Padmasambhava - the source of the Nyingma tradition. He is dressed as a king of Zahor, as we saw in Chapter Four, wearing the three royal robes, holding a golden vajra and a brimming skull cup, and with his khatvanga in the crook of his left arm. The only differences here are that he is seated cross-legged in the vajra posture, and his right hand does not rest on his right knee but clasps the vajra to his heart.

Growing out from the central lotus towards the four cardinal points are four more lotuses. On the lotus closest to us, in front of Padmasambhava, is a great assembly of Buddhas of the three times - past, present, and future. At their head is Sakyamuni, the Buddha of our own age. He is flanked by Dlpankara and Maitreya. Dlpankara was the Buddha who, long ago, predicted that Sakyamuni would gain Perfect Enlightenment. He is usually depicted in monastic robes and wearing a pandit's cap. Maitreya is the Buddha who will rediscover the path to Enlightenment after the teaching of Sakyamuni has died away.

On the lotus furthest away from us, beyond Padmasambhava, is a great heap of books of the Dharma: sutras, tantras, and commentaries. They are all wrapped in precious silks, and radiate light and the sound of the Dharma in the form of teaching and mantras.

On the lotus to the left of Padmasambhava as we look at it is a great assembly of Bodhisattvas. They are all young and attractive, dressed like Indian princes and princesses, wearing the jewels and silks that symbolize the beauty of their practice of generosity and the other Perfections.

Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri

Their bodies emit brilliant light, and surging waves of love and compassion. They are headed by Avalokitesvara, Manjusri, and Vajrapani.

On the lotus to our right are the great arhats, the enlightened disciples of the Buddha. They are of various ages, dressed in yellow monastic robes, and each holds a begging-bowl and the wanderer's staff. They are headed by Sakyamuni Buddha's chief monastic disciples, such as Sariputra, Maudgalyayana, Mahakasyapa, and Ananda.

The Buddhas of the three times, books of the Dharma, Bodhisattvas, and arhats are the embodiments of the Three Jewels in their exoteric form. However, there are yet more figures. The great white lotus on which Padmasambhava sits has three tiers of lotus petals, on which the esoteric Refuges appear in brilliant ranks.

On the tier immediately below Padmasambhava sit the great gurus. The usual practice is to have on this tier those teachers with whom one has a personal connection, by dint of having received teaching or initiation from them. Then in the sky around Padmasambhava appear the gurus of the past, especially those who preserved and transmitted the teachings that one practises. So we see a great assembly of saintly monks, scholars in pandit's caps, wild-looking yogins, and other people through whose practice and efforts the Dharma has come down to us. Each of them, out of immense kindness, has become an embodiment of the Dharma in their own lives, and made sure that the treasures of Buddhism would be preserved for future generations. They are the living links, forming the golden chain which connects us to the Buddha - a chain that has continued unbroken for two-and-a-half millennia.

On the next tier of the white lotus, below the gurus, appear the great yidams of the four classes of Tantra. These include one or two of the figures we met in Chapter Five, as well as some other yidams specific to the Nyingma tradition. The figures of the Highest Tantra are mainly swathed in flames, clasping their consorts in the close embrace that symbolizes the union of skilful means and wisdom. These figures are the esoteric Dharma Refuge.

On the lowest tier are the dakinis and dharmapalas. The ecstatic dakinis dance wildly, full of the blissful inspiration of the Dharma. Prominent among them in the Nyingma Refuge Tree will be Simhamukha, the lion-headed, blue dakini form of Padmasambhava. Along with the dakinis are the dharmapalas - the protectors of the teaching, headed by the three chief Nyingma protectors: Ekajata, Rahula, and Vajrasadhu.

In the sky directly above Padmasambhava sits Garab Dorje, dressed as a mahasiddha. He is the founder of the Dzogchen lineage, a form of practice that claims to go beyond schools and the three yanas. However, many of its most important practitioners have been Nyingma teachers. Above him in the sky is Vajrasattva, radiant white, holding the vajra to his heart and a vajra-bell to his left side. Finally, at the zenith, in a sphere of light, sits the adi-Buddha Samantabhadra (Tibetan Kuntuzangpo) - symbol of the ever-present potentiality for Buddhahood which is inherent in the universe, beyond space and time. He is naked and unadorned, his body deep blue in colour. He is seated in sexual union with his white consort, Samantabhadri.

In the vast prairies of the sky around the Refuge Tree, gods and goddesses are making delightful offerings to Padmasambhava and all the Refuges.

Refuge Trees of other schools

We have seen that each school of Tibetan Buddhism has a Refuge Tree tradition which is its centre of practice, common to all followers of that school. The general principle of the arrangement will be similar for all schools - all the Refuges, exoteric and esoteric, are ranged in the sky about a central figure who is understood to embody them all.

For the Kagyupas the central figure is usually the adi-Buddha Vajradhara. He is deep blue in colour, seated in full-lotus posture. His hands are crossed in front of his heart. In his right hand is the vajra, in his left the vajra-bell. Kagyu Refuge Trees always give prominence to the lineage of gurus we met in Chapter Four: beginning with Tilopa (who was directly inspired by Vajradhara), and continuing through Naropa, Marpa, Milarepa, and Gampopa. They are also likely to show Cakrasamvara and Vajravarahi prominently positioned among the yidams.

For the Gelukpas the central focus is Je Tsongkhapa, the founder of their school. He is dressed in monastic robes and the yellow pandit's cap, holding the stems of lotuses which bloom at his shoulders, supporting the flaming sword and book, which denote that he is considered an emanation of Manjusri. In his heart the figure of Sakyamuni Buddha is often to be seen. (One also finds Geluk Refuge assemblies whose central figure is Sakyamuni, with Vajradhara at his heart.)

Geluk Refuge Trees tend to be less obviously lotus-like than those of other schools. Usually the central figure sits on a lotus in the sky with figures on a many-tiered lotus below him. In the sky above and to each side of him are ranged a mass of gurus, so that the overall impression is of a kind of cruciform arrangement around the central figure.

In the sky above Tsongkhapa are great gurus from whom the Geluk school particularly draws its inspiration, including a number of Indian mahasiddhas. To the left, as we look, is the Bodhisatrva Maitreya, usually represented with a white stupa or chorten as his emblem. To the right is Manjusri, with the flaming sword and book. They are both surrounded by a sea of gurus. Together they represent the Method and Wisdom lineages respectively, the teachings dealing with compassionate activity and the realization of Emptiness, which were synthesized by Atisa, whose tradition the Gelukpas continue.

Below Tsongkhapa is a great array of figures on a many-tiered lotus. On the highest tiers are the yidams of Highest Tantra such as Yamantaka, Cakrasamvara, Guhyasamaja, Kalacakra, Hevajra, and Vajrayogini. Beneath them appear other figures associated with the three lower classes of Tantra. These tend to be serene and peaceful, as opposed to the flame-encircled Anuttarayoga yidams. On the succeeding tiers sit a calm array of Buddhas. A set of thirty-five Buddhas is often depicted. These are associated with a practice of confession used by those who have taken the Bodhisatrva vows, based on a passage in the Upali-Pariprccha Sutra. A set of seven Buddhas, known as Manusi Buddhas (Tibetan Sangye Rapdun) are often included too. These are Buddhas of past epochs. They are all seated in full-lotus posture, wearing monastic robes, and can be distinguished by their hand-gestures. Vipasyin has both hands on his knees, palms inwards, fingers reaching down in the earth-touching mudra.

Also frequently included in the assembly of Buddhas is a set of eight Medicine Buddhas (Tibetan Mentha Deshek gye). These Buddhas, who are particularly venerated for their healing powers, are led by the Buddha Baisajyaguru or Baisajyaraja (Tibetan Mentha). Though he is sometimes represented as golden in colour, his characteristic colour is blue. Indeed he is also known as Vaiduryaprabharaja ('king of lapis lazuli radiance'). His left hand rests in his lap in the mudra of meditation, supporting an iron begging-bowl. His right hand is at his right knee, palm outwards, offering a sprig of the myrobalan plant (Latin terminalia chebula), a healing fruit well-known in Indian medicine. His retinue consists of six other Buddhas who are his brothers in healing, and Sakyamuni Buddha, the Buddha of our epoch, who is sometimes referred to as the Great Physician because he has taught the Dharma, which is the antidote to the sickness of suffering within samsara. (The Four Noble Truths may even be based on an ancient Indian medical formula of diagnosis, cause, prognosis, and treatment.)

The Medicine Buddha appears in contexts other than the Refuge assembly. In Indian Buddhism there is a tradition of meditation on a mandala of fifty-one figures, of which he is the central one. He also became an important figure in later Chinese Buddhism. According to Raoul Birnbaum,[72] the most common set of figures on the principal shrine in large Chinese monasteries consists of Sakyamuni flanked by Amitabha to his right and Baisajyaguru to his left (which is symbolically the east, the direction in which the Pure Land of the Medicine Buddha is said to be located).

Below the Buddhas are commonly depicted eighteen arhat disciples. These are a set of sixteen arhats mentioned in Indian tradition, with the addition of their two attendants, Dharmatala and Hva-shang. These disciples of Sakyamuni are credited with having spread the Dharma all over India, up into the Himalayas, and even to the Karakoram. Each has his own individualized iconography.

Finally, on the lowest tiers of the great lotus, come the dakas, dakinis, and dharmapalas. Among the dharmapalas, particular prominence is given to Mahakala and Sridevi.

Below the great lotus stand the Four Great Kings. The lotus is a symbol of the total abandonment of samsara, so only those who have entered upon the transcendental path are represented enthroned on a lotus flower. The kings are commonly shown in full armour. The dharmapalas who are emanations of the dharmakaya generally scorn all protection, frequently going naked.[73] They are immune to being affected by anything mundane, for they have seen right through to its true, illusory nature. However, the lokapalas, though they stand at the summit of mundane existence, still need to protect themselves from its slings and arrows.

The Refuge Tree and Going for Refuge

We have now looked briefly at the Refuge Trees of some different schools of Tibetan Buddhism. Now that we have seen them, the question arises, how are we going to relate to them? There are several ways to do this. Some people appreciate them simply on an aesthetic level, looking at them in the way in which an art student might examine a painting in a museum. Those who are interested in Jungian psychology often see them as expressions of the Jungian archetypes. The gurus and arhats are aspects of the Wise Old Man, the dakinis are anima figures, the dharmapalas shadow figures, and so on. However, relating to a Refuge Tree in either of these ways is not to relate to it as a Refuge Tree at all. It only becomes a Refuge Tree when you go for Refuge to it.

Going for Refuge, committing yourself to the path to Enlightenment, is not something you do only once. Rather, it has to be repeated over and over again, as you develop. Through doing so, you acknowledge the Refuge Tree not just as an exotic picture but as a blueprint for what you can become - a vision of all the energies of your psyche transmuted and put at the service of the highest possible ideal. This vast array of figures represents the ocean of the unfolded wisdom, compassion, and energy of Buddhahood. If you make the effort to develop the potential inherent in every man and woman, it is a display of the riches of the treasure-house of your own mind. Recognizing this, you keep on committing yourself, ever more deeply, placing more and more reliance on the Three Jewels, until you yourself have become the path, and embody the Three Jewels in yourself.

One traditional meditation for deepening and strengthening this commitment is the Going for Refuge and Prostration practice (which, as we saw in Chapter Three, is one of the Foundation Yogas). In this practice you begin by visualizing the Refuge Tree in the sky in front of you, with all the Refuges, exoteric and esoteric. In addition you visualize your father and all men to your right, your mother and all women to your left. Any enemies you may have are in front of you, and your friends are ranged around immediately behind you. In this way you generate the feeling that you are not committing yourself to gain Enlightenment for yourself alone. Part of the Enlightenment experience is the realization that you are not inherently separate from other beings, so how can you aim to emancipate yourself from the wheel of suffering and leave them still trapped? Hence, from the Mahayana point of view, your aspiration to gain Buddhahood must be based on a deeply felt desire to do so in order to be of maximum usefulness to all sentient beings. The Tantric approach, as we have seen, is to make ideals as concrete as possible, so it urges you not just to feel the desire to take all beings with you on the path, but actually to do so imaginatively. Thus you visualize all other beings also committing themselves to the path to freedom around you.

In most forms of the practice you next recite a short verse expressing your aspiration to go for Refuge to the guru, the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha, until you have attained Enlightenment. Not only this, you imagine all other sentient beings wholeheartedly reciting the verse with you.

Then you make full prostrations[74] to the visualized Refuge Tree, each time reciting another verse expressive of your Going for Refuge to all the Refuges. When this practice is performed as part of the Foundation Yogas it is customary to perform a set number of prostrations every day, until you have accumulated a total of 100,000. At a rate of 100 a day, this will take three years to complete, so it is quite a commitment of energy.[75]

If you perform the practice regularly, the effect is very definitely cumulative. The more time you spend with this great vision of all the attributes of Buddhahood, the more the energies of the depths of your being are stirred. After a while, you start to feel that with each prostration you are throwing your self more deeply into the spiritual life. To start with it feels awkward; most Westerners are not used to expressing strong emotion. The idea that you should feel such devotion for something that you would just want to throw yourself face down in front of it is a strange one for us.

However, the more you do, the more natural it becomes. The stiffness of pride and the ingrained feeling that you often find in the West that 'nobody is any better than me; my opinion is as good as anyone else's', gradually dissolves away. You feel extremely happy and fortunate to be living in a universe in which there are beings much wiser and more loving than you. It becomes a relief to have an ideal to which you can aspire, for it is not an unattainable goal to which you are prostrating. There is a path which, step by step, prostration by prostration, you can follow. As you follow it, you become more fulfilled. Life gains deeper meaning. More than that, you begin to have something to offer to other people. You feel yourself part of the solution to the world's difficulties, rather than part of the problem.

As you carry on, launching yourself forward in the direction of Enlightenment, even more happens. Your feeling of being a solid self, building up a rather sketchy mental image, changes. You begin by describing the whole thing to yourself artificially: 'the dakinis should be on this tier', and so on. You feel as though you are playing a game, painting a picture. With time, though, the figures in front of you come to have a greater and greater effect. You feel yourself in the presence of something. You feel less that you are creating a picture, and more that you are contacting another level of reality.

Gradually, the great array of figures may take on at least as much reality as the 'I' which is supposedly creating them. The reality they embody is shining, brilliant, loving, wise. The distance between you and them steadily decreases. Finally, you feel no separation at all. You become your own refuge. You understand that all these figures are simply expressions of aspects of the Enlightened Mind. In experiencing those states for yourself, the path comes to an end. In realizing the same states of mind as the Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and great gurus, you and all of them, in the graphic language of Zen, 'breathe through one nostril'. At this point there is nothing to do but work for other living beings - who are no longer conceived of as 'other' or 'separate'. In Going for Refuge more and more deeply, you have become the Refuge Tree.

Future developments

Throughout this series of books I have tried to describe the Buddhist figures as they have been handed down by tradition. At times I have ventured to suggest personal associations with them, or interpretations that are not traditional, but I have not made any changes to their iconography. The question we now have to ask is: will these figures change further with time, and with their introduction to the West?

There seem to be two extreme views about this. Some people, of whom Carl Jung is probably the best known, have argued that Buddhist iconography cannot take root in the Western psyche. Jung thought the Eastern Buddhist figures too alien to be happily accepted into the unconscious of Westerners. He favoured making the best of Christianity, rather than transplanting Eastern figures into Western spiritual development. I personally think that if Jung had lived longer, he would have revised his judgement. When I first came into contact with Buddhas and Bodhisattvas I found it took very little time before I was dreaming about them and happily meditating upon them. I did not find them so strange and alien that I could not emotionally connect with them. In some ways their unfamiliarity was an advantage. As they were not familiar from my childhood I had no particular associations with them and could come to them afresh. Their 'otherness' seemed appropriate, for they symbolized a reality of which I had no experience at all. It was as though they came from a golden land I had never visited. The inhabitants of such a wondrous realm should not look like ordinary people.

As time has gone on, I have come to know hundreds of other people who found it quite easy to make an emotional link with the Buddha and Bodhisattva figures, and even the dakinis and dharmapalas. I am in contact with hundreds of people who meditate on them and do not encounter any real cultural or psychological barrier to accepting them. The figures 'work' for them.

At the other extreme are those people who are convinced of the value of the tradition, and feel that the sadhanas should be practised unchanged in the West. They are not open to any further developments. For me, there has to be a middle way between these two extremes. A tree is an organic and growing thing. So the Refuge Tree is not set in a fixed and final form. It can still change, develop, and put out more branches. Its figures can transform into new shapes. Once you understand its essence, you will see that Reality can be expressed through an ocean of different forms. In communicating your experience to other people, under new conditions, you may well find new figures appearing.

Before we see the appearance of new figures, we are more likely to find different juxtapositions and combinations of the traditional ones. One way in which this may happen is through a breaking down of sectarianism within Western Buddhism. When Buddhism has come to a new part of the world, a fresh synthesis has often been brought about which has drawn on teachings and practices from a number of different schools. This happened, for instance, in China, where the T'ien T'ai school was essentially a synthesizing school, bringing together several different elements. So there is no reason in principle why new Refuge Trees that incorporate not just figures from the Indo-Tibetan tradition but from other parts of the Buddhist world should not appear in the West.

This widening-out beyond the boundaries of traditional schools happened to a limited degree in Tibet in the nineteenth century. A number of renowned lamas of different schools, concerned about the dangers of sectarianism, started swapping their lineages of initiation and practice. Thus was born a movement known as Ri-me (without boundaries, pronouned ree-may), which has continued up to the present day. However, there is no reason why the concept underlying the Ri-me movement should not be more widely applied. Why should one not dissolve away all the boundaries between Buddhist schools? Clearly one needs to use a limited number of methods, and to follow a consistent set of instructions, otherwise one will not make much progress. It is hopeless to try to be a Tibetan Buddhist, a Pure Land follower, and a Zen practitioner all at once. Nonetheless, while for practical purposes we have to narrow down our field of concern, there is the danger that in doing so we limit our sources of inspiration, or even develop narrow-minded allegiance to one school. It is important that we feel and understand that the essence of Buddhism is Going for Refuge, and that we ourselves stand shoulder to shoulder with all those who have done so, no matter what their school or lineage.

As an example of a direction that Buddhism in the West could take, I shall mention aspects of a Refuge Tree that appears in a new sadhana introduced into the Western Buddhist Order by Sangharakshita. This tree has Sakyamuni at its centre, as the source of the entire Buddhist tradition and to emphasize the common parentage of the entire family of Buddhist schools and traditions. As usual, there are figures representing all the Refuges. What is different about this Refuge assembly is that the spiritual teachers represented do not come from just one, or even several, schools of Tibetan Buddhism. It includes figures such as Padmasambhava, Milarepa, and Tsongkhapa, but in addition there are teachers from many other Buddhist traditions. For instance, there are great masters from the Zen tradition: Hui Neng, Dogen, and Hakuin. This Refuge assembly, then, emphasizes the underlying unity of the Buddhist tradition. In Going for Refuge to it one acknowledges the various expressions of the Buddhist tradition under different circumstances as different ways in which human beings have followed the same Dharma of the Buddha, and moved in the direction of the same Enlightenment. One recognizes that one is first and foremost a follower of the Buddha and only secondarily a member of a particular Buddhist school. Thus the practice is a strong antidote to sectarianism.

Even though this new Refuge Tree incorporates figures not found in the Tibetan tradition, it does not introduce any new iconographic element into Buddhism as a whole. The spiritual teachers from different countries are all visualized following traditional representations. As time goes on, however, I am sure that there will be changes in the forms of Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric deities, just because they are being depicted or visualized by Westerners. I have friends who are artists, who paint and sculpt Buddha and Bodhisattva figures. They adhere to the tradition, and yet... they are Westerners, and one can see that their work expresses their Westernness. Faces become less oriental; one can see the influence of great Western artists in the style of their painting and sculpture. I have no doubt that this is how new forms will gradually emerge. Western artists and meditators do not need to try to produce figures appropriate for the West. We just have to pour ourselves wholeheartedly into the traditional forms. Once we have become deeply imbued with the spirit of the tradition, once we have begun to see beyond their forms to the Reality of which they are an expression, then changes will naturally occur. Over perhaps a few generations, completely new figures will emerge. In future, Western Refuge Trees we shall find, as well as new manifestations of Buddhas and Bodhisattvas, and Western men and women among the ranks of the spiritual teachers.

So this series of books will never be finished, once and for all - or at least not as long as there are people practising the Dharma, and exploring the golden realms of higher states of consciousness. What I have written is only a summary of the story so far. Now that the Dharma has come to the West, we have the opportunity to unfold still further the rich tapestry of Buddhist symbolism by making contact with the beautiful archetypal figures of the Buddhist tradition, going for Refuge to them, and making them our own through meditation and devotional practice. Then through our meetings with the Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, and Tantric deities, we shall be able to add further chapters to this book, to reveal more of the treasures to be found in the storehouse of the human mind.

Notes

1 The Buddha often stayed at the Vultures's Peak (Grdhrakuta) from where he delivered many discourses. It is on a hill near Rajgir in Bihar, and now a major Buddhist pilgrimage site.

2 The Nyingma school counts six levels of Tantra: kriya, upa-yoga, yoga, maha-yoga, anu-yoga, and ati-yoga. For a schematic sketch of these, see Professor G. Tucci, The Religions of Tibet, Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1980, pp.76-81.

3 This is not the only possible arrangement of the five Buddhas in the manda-la. To generalize, in most of the earlier tantras and in the practices of the Nyingma school, Vairocana is at the centre, while many of the later tantras, including the Highest Tantra practices of the other main Tibetan Buddhist schools, have Aksobhya as the main figure.

4 For a very full account of these channels, winds, and drops, see Geshe Kelsang Gyatso, Clear Light of Bliss, Wisdom Publications, 1982, chapter 1.

5 Yab-yum is an honorific term. The ordinary Tibetan for 'father-mother' would be pha-ma.

6 The Tibetan Book of the Dead, Trungpa and Fremantle translation, Shambhala, 1975, p.6o.

7 I am here quoting the slightly amended version of the sonnet, published under Keats's supervision in 1817.1 have followed the punctuation given in fohn Keats - The Complete Poems, ed. John Barnard, Penguin, second edition, 1977.

8 On the first of his three trips to India, Marpa the Translator (see Chapter Four) was carrying with him many precious texts previously unknown in Tibet. His travelling companion, Nyo of Kharak, was jealous of Marpa's more valuable haul from their sojourn in India. As they were being ferried across the Ganges he bribed someone to throw Marpa's texts into the river. See The Life of Marpa the Translator, trans. Nalanda Translation Committee directed by Chogyam Trungpa, Prajna Press, 1982, pp.36-42.

9 See The Perfection of Wisdom in 8,000 Lines and its Verse Summary, trans. Edward Conze, Four Seasons Foundation, 1973, p.9.

10 In his hasty enthusiasm, Keats may be forgiven for getting his facts confused. The first European to view the Pacific from the New World was not Cortez but Balboa. Furthermore, he was not rendered speechless by the experience, but gave vent to the typically Spanish exclamation 'Hombre!'

11 In this description of the development of the Prajnaparamita literature I am following the view of Edward Conze. Some Japanese scholars place the Diamond Sutra somewhat earlier.

12 See Heart of Wisdom, Tharpa, 1986, pp.156-63.

13 Edward Conze's translation, in Buddhist Wisdom Books, Unwin, 1988, p. 115.

14 According to B. Bhattacharyya this form is known as Kanaka Prajnaparamita. (See The Indian Buddhist Iconography, Firma klm Private Ltd., 1987, p.199.)

15 The individual parts of the mantra can be assigned meaning, or at least have connotations, but it is not really possible to build from these a 'translation' of the mantra as a whole.

16 When chanted in Tibetan monasteries and Dharma centres, this mantra is often prefaced with tadyatha om. Tadyatha (often pronounced tayata by Tibetans) means 'it is like this'.

17 See, for example, Geshe Rabten, Echoes of Voidness, Wisdom, 1985, pp.43-4, and Heart of Wisdom, Tharpa, 1986, pp.132-3. As with so much Tibetan teaching, they are here following earlier Indian Buddhist commentaries, some of which can be found in Donald S. Lopez Jr, The Heart Sutra Explained, State University of New York Press, 1988.

18 The exact list varies from school to school. The main meditations are: (1) Going for Refuge and Prostrations, (2) Generating the Bodhicitta, (3) Vajrasattva purification, (4) Offering the Mandala, (5) Guru Yoga. The Nyingmapas frequently talk of the four Foundations, with the Guru Yoga becoming a further practice. The Kagyupas usually amalgamate Going for Refuge and Bodhicitta, hence producing a different set of four. The Gelukpas add further preliminaries to make a total of nine. (See the books by Jamgon Kongtrul, Geshe Rabten, and Khetsun Sangpo Rinbochay in the Selected Reading for this chapter.)

19 See, for example, the Tharpe Delam - The Smooth Path to Emancipation, part of a larger Nyingma meditation manual. A translation by Michael Hookham was published by Kham Tibetan House, Saffron Walden (n.d.), under the title The Bliss Path of the Liberation ofMaha-Ati Meditation.

20 The understanding that one has a Buddha-nature outside time must not be taken as an excuse for inaction. It is not good enough to sit back thinking, 'I am already Enlightened'. We still have to realize this truth directly through our own efforts to go for Refuge.

21 The wording of the mantra in Sanskrit and its translation into English both present problems. After some thought, I have here used a version by Dhammachari Sthiramati. It does not follow any of the Tibetan ways of chanting the mantra, but makes good sense of the Sanskrit. After comparing nineteen different texts, he makes a persuasive case for his version in The Order Journal, issue 3, published privately, November 1990, pp.60-73.

22 Without the hum phat, the mantra as given here has exactly one hundred syllables.

23 For an explanation of the meaning of 'skilfulness' in Buddhism, see the Glossary entry for karma.

24 Quoted in Roshi Philip Kapleau, Zen: Dawn in the West, Rider, 1980, p.184.

25 While this is generally true, the Tantric tradition is aware of the danger of this situation being exploited by gurus who are 'not what they ought to be'. There are usually safeguards which enable the disciple to decline to follow any advice of the guru that would go against the Dharma. There is a particularly helpful discussion of the guru-disciple relationship by the fourteenth Dalai Lama in chapter 3 of his commentary to the third Dalai Lama's Essence of Refined Gold, trans. Glenn H. Mullin, Snow Lion, Ithaca N.Y. 1982.

26 Padmasambhava even has his own Pure Land, known as the Glorious Copper-Coloured Mountain (Tibetan Zangdok Palri).

27 For an authoritative discussion of the history of the various traditions of Vajrakila see Dudjom Rimpoche, The Nyingma School of Tibetan Buddhism, Its Fundamentals and History, Wisdom Publications, 1991, vol. 1, pp.710-16.

28 In describing the symbolism of this form of Padmasambhava, I am largely following the oral commentary of Sangharakshita. For a valuable interpretation which differs from mine in many details, see that of Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche in The WishfulfillingJewel, Shambhala, 1988, pp.21-4.

30 For an account of this incident, see Nam-mkha'i snying-po, Mother of Knowledge, trans. Tarthang Tulku, Dharma Publishing, 1983, pp.71-2.

31 This was the dakini Vajrayogini. See Chapter Six.

37 Geshe Wangyal, The Door of Liberation, Wisdom Publications, 1995, p.141.

3 8 I want again to express my thanks to Graham P. Coleman of the Orient Foundation for confirming that these five yidams of Highest Tantra (along with Vajrayogini, whom we shall meet in the next chapter) are the ones on which most teachings have been given by Tibetan lamas in the West. However it is with regret that considerations of space have prevented me from examining deities associated particularly with the Nyingma tradition, such as Vajrakila.

39 All this is rather complex. David Snellgrove gives a very succinct explanation: 'Sambara and samvara represent the same name in Sanskrit with slightly variant spellings, but the second spelling happens to be identical with the word meaning a vow or a bond. Thus the Tibetans translated them differently: Sambara as bDe-mchog[Demchog], "Supreme Bliss," which is how they interpret this name, whatever the spelling, and Samvara as sDom-pa [Dompa], understood as "binding" or "union". The compound name, Cakrasamvara, is therefore interpreted as the "union of the wheel and the elements" explained in various ways, but suggesting in every case the blissful state of perfect wisdom.' David L. Snellgrove, Indo-Tibetan Buddhism, Serindia, 1987, p.153.

40 The attributes of these deities vary depending on the particular lineage of instructions you follow. They may be two- or four-armed. Bhairava may hold a cutlass and staff or other emblems instead of the knife and skull cup.

41 For example, Tibetan Buddhists consider that Cakrasamvara has his abode on Mount Kailash (Tibetan Gang Rimpoche), a mountain in south-western Tibet. Hindus consider this mountain to be the throne of Shiva.

42 More literally this means 'joined in a pair'.

43 While Vajrabhairava is always classified as a yidam of the Father Tantra, Tsongkhapa in his Lam Rim Chenmo says that Vajrabhairava sums up all Father and Mother Tantras and has iconographical aspects not found in any other tantra.

44 This incident is the twenty-ninth case in the koan collection known as the Mumonkan or the 'Gateless Gate'. There are several translations in English. See, for example, Two Zen Classics: Mumonkan and Hekiganroku, trans. Katsuki Sekida, Weatherhill, 1977.

45 Raphael Henry Gross (ed.), A Century of the Catholic Essay, Ayer Publishing 1971,.233.

46 There is another classification system, used mainly by the Sakyapas, that adds a third category of non-dual tantras, which balance method and wisdom. According to this system, Hevajra and Kalacakra (discussed below) are both considered non-dual tantras.

47 David L. Snellgrove, Indo-Tibetan Buddhism, Serindia, 1987, p.I 56.

48 Nairatmya is commonly the consort of Hevajra, though in certain sadhanas his consort may be Vajravarahi (Cakrasamvara's consort) or Vajrasrnkala (diamond chain).

49 Or, in some traditions, a lion.

50 In traditional Vedic astrology, the north lunar node is called the dragon's head (Rahu), and is considered an eighth planet, the other seven being the Sun, Moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn.

51 The Tibetan historian Buton (1290-13 64) gives a different account, in which it was Vajrapani who taught the Tantra to Indrabhuti. His kingdom then became a huge lake full of nagas, to whom Vajrapani gave the Tantra for safe keeping. The nagas wrote it on golden leaves with lapis lazuli, and later passed it on to a dakini.

52 The mandala of Manjuvajra is the first in the important collection known as the 'Nispanna Yogavali. In this, Manjuvajra is vermilion red and six-armed. With his central pair of arms he embraces his consort, and in the others he holds a sword, arrow, lotus, and bow.

53 This is the Vajrayana name for what in hatha yoga is known as padmasana - the full-lotus posture.

54 The initiations the Dalai Lama gives are known as the 'seven initiations in the pattern of childhood' and authorize practice of the generation stage of Kalacakra, involving visualization of the mandala. There are a further eight initiations in the Kalacakra system, which empower one to practise the advanced meditations of the completion stage.

55 Although this is the traditional view, there is no scholarly evidence for this or any other tantra having been taught by the historical Buddha during his lifetime.

56 The exact tally depends on how you count. Are the yab-yum figures one or two? However you do it, the total is impressive. Lokesh Chandra makes it 634, Jeffrey Hopkins manages to reach 722.

57 In Tantric practice dakas and dakinis are sometimes referred to as heroes (Tibetan*pawo)* and heroines (.Tibetan*panto).*

58 For examples of rituals involving Kurukulla see Stephan Beyer, The Cult of Tara, University of California Press, 1978, pp.301-2.1 suggest that some of them perhaps come a little close to black magic not because they are performed for an unskilful purpose (though taken out of context they could be), but because they are attempts to use magic power to coerce people or spirits against their will.

59 e.g. Herbert V. Guenther, The Life and Teaching of Naropa, Oxford University Press, 1963, p.67.

60 For these reasons, Guenther has described dakinis as 'ciphers of transcendence', a phrase borrowed from the Existentialist philosopher Karl Jaspers. See Herbert V. Guenther, Tibetan Buddhism Without Mystification, E.J. Brill, 1966, p.103.

64 From A Prayer to Mahakala' by the first Dalai Lama, trans. Glenn Mullin, in Selected Works of the Dalai Lama I, second edition, Snow Lion, 1985, p. 199.

65 Here I am following The Gods of Northern Buddhism by Alice Getty (Charles E. Tuttle, 1962), who bases some of her account of Sridevi on Schlagintweit's Buddhism in Tibet. According to Getty, in one of her previous lives Sridevi was married to the King of the Demons (yaksas) in Ceylon (Sri Lanka). She vowed that she would convert them to the Dharma or wipe out the royal race. When she failed to interest her husband in the Dharma she 'flayed her son alive, drank his blood, and even ate his flesh'.

71 The Crystal and the Way of Light (see Note 62), p.129.

73 One exception is the Dharmapala Bektse, an indigenous Mongolian deity converted to the Dharma by the third Dalai Lama. He is red in colour, brandishing a sword and a trident with a fluttering banner, and wears a coat of mail. In fact his name comes from the Mongolian begder meaning coat of mail.

74 Full prostrations involve prostrating full-length on the ground, then raising your joined hands above your head in a gesture of salutation.

75 There is no particular need to stop at 100,000; some Tibetans accumulate millions of prostrations in the course of their lifetime. It is also possible to perform the Foundation Yogas as part of a daily practice without any concern to reaching a set number. According to Namkhai Norbu Rimpoche, this is the approach taken by Dzogchen. See The Crystal and the Way of Light (Note 62),p.117.

Glossary

ABHIDHARMA One of the three main branches of Buddhist literature, dealing with the analysis of phenomena and mental states.

ANIMAL REALM The realm of existence in which consciousness is dominated by the struggle for survival and the basic drives for food, sex, and sleep. It may refer to actual animals or to human beings in such states of consciousness.

ARCHETYPAL REALM The objective pole of a supernormal level of consciousness. A level of heightened experience on which everything is imbued with rich symbolic meaning.

ARCHETYPE A deep patterning of the mind, which often expresses itself through myth and symbol. Archetypal experience is often tinged with a feeling of supra-personal reality.

ARHAT Originally a term of respect for someone who had gained Enlightenment. In Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhism it came to represent someone who settled for the lesser ideal of personal emancipation from suffering, in contrast to the Bodhisattva (q.v.).

ASURA Similar to the Titans of Greek mythology, asuras are powerful and jealous beings who are prepared to use force and manipulation to gain their own ends. In the Wheel of Life (q.v.) they are represented as warring with the gods. They may be seen as objectively-existent beings or as symbols for states of mind sometimes experienced by human beings. Female asuras are called asuris and are represented as voluptuous. Asuris play on their seductive charms to gain their own ends.

BARDO (Tibetan) The 'state between' two other states of being. In particular the intermediate state between one life and the next.

BHIKSHU A Buddhist mendicant (Sanskrit bhiksu).

BODHICITTA The compassionate 'desire' (based not on egoistic volitions but on insight into the true nature of things) to gain Enlightenment for the benefit of all living beings. More technically, it can be divided into absolute Bodhicitta, which is synonymous with transcendental 'wisdom, and relative Bodhicitta - the heartfelt compassion that is the natural consequence of an experience of absolute Bodhicitta.

BODHISATTVA A being pledged to become a Buddha so as to be in the best position to help all other beings to escape from suffering by gaining Enlightenment.

BUDDHA A title, meaning one who is awake. A Buddha is someone who has gained Enlightenment - the perfection of wisdom and compassion. In particular, the title applied to Siddhartha Gautama, also known as Sakyamuni, the founder of Buddhism.

BUDDHA FAMILY The five main groupings into which every aspect of existence - both mundane and transcendental - is divided in Tantric Buddhism. The blueprint for these groupings is provided by the mandala of the five Jinas (q.v.).

BUDDHAS, FIVE Another name for the five Jinas (q.v.).

CHAKRA Literally 'wheel'. (Anglicized, from the Sanskrit cakra.) Centres of energy visualized within the body in some forms of Buddhist Tantric meditation.

CLEAR LIGHT The experience of the natural state of the mind, of consciousness 'undiluted' by any tendency to move towards sensory experience. Recognition of the nature of this state is synonymous with Enlightenment.

COMPLETION STAGE The second of the two stages of Highest Tantra (q.v.). It focuses on advanced practices designed to concentrate and channel the most subtle energies of the psychophysical organism, in order to bring about the speedy attainment of Enlightenment.

CONDITIONED EXISTENCE See samsara.

DAKA The male equivalent of a dakini.

DAKINI A class of beings who appear in the form of women (though they may sometimes be represented with the heads of animals). They may be more or less evolved, from fiends and witches to Enlightened beings. In the Buddhist Tantra they often function as messengers, and frequently represent upsurging inspiration or non-conceptual understanding.

DAMARU A drum, usually double-headed and made either of skulls or of wood, used in some forms of Tantric meditation and ritual.

DEVA A long-lived being who experiences refined and blissful states of mind. Devas thus inhabit a heavenly realm. These realms can be interpreted as objective or as symbols for states of mind in which human beings can dwell.

DHARMA A word with numerous meanings. Among other things it can mean truth or reality. It also stands for all those teachings and methods which are conducive to gaining Enlightenment, and thereby seeing things as they truly are, particularly the teachings of the Buddha.

DHARMAKAYA Literally 'body of truth'. The mind of a Buddha. The Enlightened experience, unmediated by concepts or symbols.

DHARMAPALA A protector of the Dharma. Buddhism recognizes many Dharmapalas. Some may be expressions of the Enlightened mind, others are beings on a mundane level who are sympathetic to the Dharma.

DHYANA A state of supernormal concentration on a wholesome object. It may occur spontaneously, but is generally the fruit of successful meditation practice. Buddhist tradition recognizes different levels of dhyana, each one increasingly refined and satisfying.

DZOGCHEN (Tibetan) A set of advanced teachings and practices particularly associated with the Nyingma school (q.v.) of Tibetan Buddhism.

EMPTINESS Seesunyata.

ENLIGHTENMENT A state of perfect wisdom and limitless compassion. The only permanently satisfying solution to the human predicament. The achievement of a Buddha.

ESOTERIC REFUGES Those Refuges (q.v.) which are matters of direct personal experience, embodied in the guru, yidam, and dakini (all q.v.) by the Buddhist Tantra.

EXOTERIC REFUGES The Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha (all q.v.).

FOUNDATION YOGAS A set of meditational or yogic practices whose performance helps overcome mental hindrances and accumulate positive impressions in the mind. They can be practised in preparation for the meditations of Highest Tantra (q.v.), or purely for their own intrinsic value.

GARUDA A species of mythical bird, enemy of the nagas (q.v.).

GELUK By far the largest of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism, founded in the fourteenth century by Tsongkhapa. It emphasizes ethical discipline and training in clear thinking as a basis for meditation.

GENERATION STAGE The first of the two stages of Highest Tantra (q.v.). It focuses on the development of the vivid visualization and experience of oneself as a deity.

GESHE (Tibetan) A title awarded in the Kadam and Geluk schools of Tibetan Buddhism to those who have become deeply accomplished in Buddhist studies. The wordgeshe relates to the Sanskrit kalyana mitra, meaning spiritual friend - so ageshe in the true sense is one who can act as a wise and learned spiritual advisor.

GOING FOR REFUGE The act of committing oneself to the attainment of Enlightenment by reliance on the three Refuges (q.v). Also refers to the ceremony by which one formally becomes a Buddhist.

GREAT BLISS A state of ecstatic happiness achieved through the realization of the illusory nature of the ego. In Highest Tantra (q.v.) it is cultivated as an integral part of contemplation of sunyata (q.v.).

GURU A person who through teaching and/or personal example helps other people to follow the path to Enlightenment.

HELL REALM A state of extreme physical or mental suffering, the hell realms may be understood as objective states into which one can be reborn, or as symbols for states of extreme distress experienced in the course of human life. Buddhism has no concept of a permanent state of perdition.

HERUKA A general appellation for a wrathful male Tantric deity. Also an epithet of the yidam (q.v.) Cakrasamvara.

HIGHEST TANTRA The most advanced of the four levels of Buddhist Tantra. It consists of the Generation and Completion stages (both q.v.).

HINAYANA The 'lesser way' or 'lesser vehicle'. Buddhist schools who do not advocate the Bodhisattva ideal. Though in common use among Mahayana and Vajrayana Buddhists, the term is regarded as pejorative by the Theravada school (q.v.).

HUMAN REALM The state of being 'truly human' - characterized by a balanced awareness of both the pleasant and painful aspects of life, and a capacity to co-operate and empathize with others. In Buddhism this state is regarded as the best starting-point from which to enter the path to Enlightenment.

HUNGRY GHOST A class of being (preta in Sanskrit) too overcome by craving to gain satisfaction from any experience. The idea can be interpreted literally, or symbolically as a state of mind sometimes experienced by human beings. Pretas are represented in Buddhist art with large stomachs and pinhole mouths.

JEWELS, THREE The Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha (all q.v.). The three highest values in Buddhism.

JINAS, FIVE A very important set of five Buddhas, often represented as interrelated in a mandala (q.v.) pattern. They each embody a particular Wisdom (Sanskrit jhana) - an aspect of the Enlightened vision. Jina literally means 'conqueror'.

KADAM A school of Tibetan Buddhism springing from the Indian teacher Atisa in the eleventh century. It no longer survives, but its teachings were taken over by the Gelukpas, who are sometimes referred to as the New Kadam school.

KAGYU One of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism, founded in the eleventh century by Gampopa. It emphasizes meditation and has produced many successful solitary meditators.

KARMA Literally 'action'. Simply stated, the so-called 'law of karma' says that our willed actions (mental and vocal as well as physical) will have consequences for us in the future. 'Skilful' actions arising from states of love, tranquillity, and wisdom, will result in happiness. 'Unskilful' actions, based on craving, aversion, and ignorance, will produce painful results.

KHATVANGA A magic staff, usually adorned with skulls and other symbols. It is an important symbol in Tantric Buddhism.

LAMA (Tibetan) see guru.

LAM DRE (Tibetan) 'Path and Fruit', a system of teaching of the complete path to Enlightenment preserved and transmitted especially within the Sakya school (q.v.) of Tibetan Buddhism.

LAM RIM (Tibetan) 'Graduated Path'. A system of teaching founded by the Indian master Atisa in which all the stages of the path to Enlightenment are laid out in a very clear and systematic manner. Each of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism has produced Lam Rim texts.

LOWER TANTRAS The first three of the four main divisions of Buddhist Tantra (q.v.): action (Sanskrit kriya), performance (Sanskrit carya), and union (Sanskrit yoga).

MADHYAMAKA A school of Mahayana thought founded by the Indian teacher Nagarjuna. It is characterized by a denial that concepts can ever accurately describe Reality.

MAHASIDDHAS, EIGHTY-FOUR An important set of Enlightened Tantric practitioners.

MAHAYANA The 'great way' or 'great vehicle'. Those schools of Buddhism that teach the Bodhisattva ideal - of selfless striving to gain Enlightenment so as to be in the best possible position to help all other living beings to escape from suffering.

MAHAYANA PATHS, FIVE Five stages of the path to Enlightenment, according to the Mahayana. They are the stages of accumulation, preparation, seeing, meditation, and 'no more learning'.

MANDALA A word with various meanings in different contexts. In this book it means a pattern of elements around a central focus. Ideal mandalas are often used as objects of meditation in Buddhist Tantra.

MANTRA A string of sound-symbols recited to concentrate and protect the mind. Many Buddhist figures have mantras associated with them. Through reciting their mantra one deepens one's connection with the aspect of Enlightenment which the figure embodies.

MARA The Buddhist personification of everything that tends to promote suffering and hinder growth towards Enlightenment. It literally means 'death'.

MERITS The positive states generated through the performance of virtuous actions, which predispose one to encounter happy and fortunate circumstances.

MUDRA Can be the general term for a Tantric emblem. In this book it is used in its sense of a hand gesture imbued with symbolic significance. In Tantric Buddhism it can also refer to a female consort.

NAGA A class of powerful serpents associated with water. They have something of the same symbolism as dragons, being guardians of treasures, and associated with -wisdom.

NIRVANA The state of Enlightenment, the cessation of suffering. For the Mahayana (q.v.) it became a lesser ideal - a state of blissful happiness in which one could settle down rather than working compassionately to help all other beings to attain the same happy state.

NYINGMA The oldest of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism, deriving its original inspiration from the Indian teacher Padmasambhava, who went to Tibet in the eighth century.

PANDIT An Indian scholar.

PERFECTION (Sanskrit paramita) The main positive qualities that the Bodhisattva (q.v.) strives to develop. A positive quality only becomes a paramita in the full sense when it is imbued with transcendental wisdom. The six perfections constitute the most important list of positive qualities in Mahayana (q.v.) Buddhism: generosity, ethics, patience, effort, meditation, and wisdom.

POISONS, FIVE Ignorance, hatred, pride, craving, and envy. Known as klesas in Sanskrit.

PRAJNA Direct intuitive apprehension of the real nature of things. This is usually brought about by (1) listening to the Buddhist teachings, (2) reflecting upon them, (3) meditating upon them.

PURE LAND A realm created through the meditative concentration and meritorious actions of a Buddha, in which beings can be reborn. In a Pure Land, conditions are totally favourable for progress towards Buddhahood. Also, the schools of Buddhism whose practice centres on being reborn in such realms.

REALMS, SIX A classification of all the possibilities for rebirth within conditioned existence. They are the realms of the devas, asuras, humans, animals, hungry ghosts, and beings in hell (all q.v.). The six realms are pictorially represented in the Wheel of Life (q.v.).

REFLEX Certain of the five jinas can appear in a second form, which demonstrates another aspect of their Wisdom. This second form is sometimes described as the 'reflex' of the Jina.

REFUGE One of the things on which Buddhism believes it is wise to rely. The three Refuges - the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha - are common to all forms of Buddhism. The Esoteric Refuges (q.v.) are peculiar to Buddhist Tantra.

RIMPOCHE (OR RINPOCHE) (Tibetan) An honorific title for a Tibetan Buddhist master - especially one who is believed to be the rebirth or emanation of a previous highly-developed Buddhist practitioner. It literally means 'precious one'.

SADHANA A general Sanskrit word for one's personal religious practice. More specifically, a Buddhist Tantric practice usually involving visualization and mantra recitation. The written text of such a Tantric practice.

SAKYA One of the four main schools of Tibetan Buddhism, deriving its original inspiration from the Indian Tantric master Virupa.

SAMAYA The commitments one takes upon oneself on receiving Vajrayana (q.v.) initiation.

SAMSARA The cyclic round of birth and death, marked by suffering and frustration, which can only be brought to an end by the attainment of Enlightenment.

SANGHA In the widest sense, the community of all those who are following the path to Buddhahood. As one of the Refuges (q.v.) it refers to the Arya or Noble Sangha - those Buddhist practitioners who have gained insight into the true nature of things and whose progress towards Buddhahood is certain. In other contexts the term can refer to those who have taken ordination as Buddhist monks or nuns.

SEED SYLLABLE Subtle sound-symbols through which Enlightened beings can communicate the Dharma to those on advanced stages of the path to Enlightenment. They are often visualized in Tantric meditation.

SAKYAMUNI The 'sage of the Sakyans', an epithet of Siddhartha Gautama, the founder of Buddhism.

SIDDHI Supernormal attainments (such as telepathy) gained through meditation, especially using the methods of Buddhist Tantra. Enlightenment is the supreme siddhi.

SKILFUL MEANS See upaya.

SPIRITUAL In this book, spiritual means concerned with the development of higher states of consciousness, especially with the path to Enlightenment. In this context it has nothing to do with spirits or spiritualism.

STUPA Originally a mound or structure built to commemorate a Buddha or other highly-developed person, and often containing relics. It became a symbol for the mind of a Buddha.

SUBTLE BODY A subtle counterpart to the physical body, made up of refined psychophysical energies, which is visualized in some forms of Tantric meditation.

SUNYATA Literally 'emptiness' or 'voidness'. The ultimate nature of existence, the absolute aspect of all cognizable things. The doctrine of sunyata holds that all phenomena arc empty (sunya) of any permanent unchanging self or essence. By extension, it can mean the transcendental (q.v.) experience brought about by direct intuitive insight into the empty nature of things.

SUTRA Literally 'thread'. A discourse given by the Buddha, or by one of his senior disciples and approved by him, and included in the Buddhist canon. Sutra is Sanskrit; the Pali is sutta.

TANTRA A form of Buddhism making use of yogic practices of visualization, mantra, mudra, and mandalas (all q.v.), as well as symbolic ritual, and meditations which work with subtle psychophysical energies. Also (lower case) the Buddhist texts, often couched in symbolic language, in which these practices are described.

TATHAGATA A title of the Buddha. Can mean 'one thus gone' or 'one thus come'. A Buddha goes from the world through wisdom - seeing its illusory nature. He comes into it through compassion - in order to teach living beings how to put an end to suffering.

THANGKA (Tibetan) A Tibetan religious painting.

THERAVADA The 'School of the Elders' - the form of Buddhism prevalent in Thailand, Burma, and Sri Lanka.

TITAN See asura.

TRANSCENDENTAL (Sanskrit lokottara). Experience that goes beyond the cyclic, mundane round of birth and death. The experience or viewpoint of an Enlightened being.

TRUTHS, TWO The ultimate truth (Sanskrit*paramartha satya)* and the relative truth (Sanskrit samvrti satya). According to the Mahayana view, the ultimate truth is the true nature of Reality, sunyata, the absence of inherent existence of all phenomena; this can never be adequately described in words. The relative truth is the conceptual formulations of Reality taught by the Buddha, such as the law of conditionality (Sanskrit*pratitya samutpada).*

UPAYA The skilful methods compassionately employed by Buddhas and others to interest people in the Dharma and encourage them to follow the path to Enlightenment.

VAJRA A ritual sceptre, which symbolically combines the qualities of both diamond and thunderbolt.

VAJRAGURU A master and teacher of Buddhist Tantra.

VAJRAYANA The 'way of the diamond thunderbolt' - Buddhist Tantra (q.v.) of India and the Himalayan region.

VISUALIZATION A common method of Buddhist meditation, involving the use of imagination to create vivid symbolic forms.

WHEEL OF LIFE A graphic representation in one painting of the whole process through which craving, hatred, and ignorance cause living beings to circle in states of unsatisfactoriness. It includes depictions of the six realms of devas, asuras, humans, animals, hungry ghosts, and beings in hell (all q.v.), which together represent all the mental states unenlightened living beings can experience.

WISDOMS, FIVE The Wisdoms of the five Jinas (q.v.): the Mirror-Like Wisdom, Wisdom of Equality, Discriminating Wisdom, All-Accomplishing Wisdom, and the Wisdom of the Dharmadhatu (sphere of reality).

YAB-YUM (Tibetan) Literally an honorific term for 'father-mother'. The Tibetan term for a Buddha or other deity represented in sexual union with a consort.

YANA A 'way' or 'vehicle' which can be used for attaining Buddhahood. One of the great streams of thought and teaching (embracing a number of schools) that have appeared in the development of Buddhism. (See Hlnayana, Mahayana, Vajrayana).

YIDAM (Tibetan) A Buddhist meditational deity embodying an aspect of Enlightenment. The term is sometimes reserved for meditational deities visualized in Highest Tantra (q.v.).

YOGA A Sanskrit word meaning union. In Buddhist Tantra it refers to a method of meditation or physical exercise designed to bring about spiritual development.

YOGIN A male practitioner of yoga. The term is applied particularly to adepts of Buddhist Tantra.

YOGINI A female practitioner of yoga; a female Tantric adept.

ZEN (Japanese) A school of Mahayana Buddhism found mainly in Japan and Korea. 'Zen' is derived from the Sanskrit word dhyana meaning meditation, and Zen places great emphasis on the practice of seated meditation. It aims not to rely on words and logical concepts for communicating the Dharma, often preferring to employ action or paradoxes.

Windhorse Publications is a Buddhist publishing house, staffed by practising Buddhists. We place great emphasis on producing books of high quality, accessible and relevant to those interested in Buddhism at whatever level. Drawing on the whole range of the Buddhist tradition, our books include translations of traditional texts, commentaries, books that make links with Western culture and ways of life, biographies of Buddhists, and works on meditation.

As a charitable institution we welcome donations to help us continue our work. We also welcome manuscripts on aspects of Buddhism or meditation. To join our email list, leave your address on our website. For orders and catalogues log on to www.windhorsepublications.com or contact:

Windhorse Publications is an arm of the Friends of the Western Buddhist Order, which has more than sixty centres on four continents. Through these centres, members of the Western Buddhist Order offer regular programmes of events for the general public and for more experienced students. These include meditation classes, public talks, study on Buddhist themes and texts, and bodywork classes such as t'ai chi, yoga, and massage. The FWBO also runs several retreat centres and the Karuna Trust, a fundraising charity that supports social welfare projects in the slums and villages of southern Asia.

Many FWBO centres have residential spiritual communities and ethical businesses associated with them. Arts activities are encouraged too, as is the development of strong bonds of friendship between people who share the same ideals. In this way the FWBO is developing a unique approach to Buddhism, not simply as a set of techniques, but as a creatively directed way of life for people living in the modern world.

If you would like more information about the FWBO please visit the website at www.fwbo.org or write to

by Vessantara

The breath: always with us, necessary to our very existence, but often unnoticed. Yet giving it attention can transform our lives.

This is a very useful combination of practical instruction on the mindfulness of breathing with much broader lessons on where the breath can lead us. Vessantara, a meditator of many years experience, offers us:

* Clear instruction on how to meditate on the breath
* Practical ways to integrate meditation into our lives
* Suggestions for deepening calm and concentration
* Advice on how to let go and dive into experience
* Insights into the lessons of the breath

The Breath returns us again and again to the fundamental and precious experience of being alive.

The Heart

by Vessantara

The Heart offers ways to discover your emotional potential through an exploration of the practice of loving-kindness meditation.

Vessantara has practised this meditation for over thirty years. Here he shares his experience, gently encouraging us to unlock what is in our hearts and helping us to gain greater enjoyment from life. Among other benefits, using the exercises and meditations in this book you can:

* Increase your emotional awareness
* Feel more at case with yourself
* Become kinder and more open-hearted
* Discover how to be more patient
* Engage more spontaneously with life.

The Heart provides clear instruction and helpful suggestions for those new to meditation as well as more experienced practitioners.

Buddhism: Tools for Living Your Life

by Vajragupta

This book is a guide for those seeking a meaningful spiritual path while living everyday lives full of families, work, and friends. Vajragupta provides clear explanations of Buddhist teachings and guidance applying these to enrich our busy and complex lives.

The personal stories, exercises, reflections, and questions in this book help transform Buddhist practice into more than a fine set of ideals. They make the path of ethics, meditation, and wisdom a tangible part of our lives.

> In this book I have attempted to convey a feeling for what a 'Buddhist life' might he like - the underlying flavour, or ethos, of such a life. I hope I have made it clear that this way of life is possible for anyone - whatever their background and experience. My aim is to make the teachings as accessible and relevant as possible, and to give you some 'tools' with which to live a spiritual life.

"I'm very pleased that someone has finally written this book! At last, a real 'toolkit' for living a Buddhist life. His practical suggestions are hard to resist!"

Creative Symbols of Tantric Buddhism

by Sangharakshita

Tantric Buddhism is concerned with the direct experience of who we are and what we can become. For the Tantra this experience cannot be meditated by concepts, but it can be evoked with the help of symbols.

This is a thorough and informative introduction to:

* The symbolism of colour, mantras, and the mandala of the five Buddhas
* The Tibetan Wheel of Life - a map of our mind and emotions
* Figures of the Tantric tradition - Buddhas, Bodhisattvas, dakinis, and the archetypal guru
* The symbolism of ritual objects and offerings
* Confronting and transforming our fear of crisis situations and death
